Old-Fashioned Americanism.

In "Isabel Stirling" the author, Evelyn Schuyler Schaeffer, has written a sort of American prototype to May Sinclair's "Mary Olivier," although the American novel is not written in the first person. But it is a minutely followed recital of a woman's inner and outer life, beginning with her early childhood and leading up to her rejection, while a young widow in the early thirties, of a man fitted in every way to be her husband.

The story is of Isabel's life and the people figuring in it all belong to that survival of the Puritanic side of our American life which is rapidly passing away. Even now it is beginning to attain to the dignity of that which is enshrined in a sort of sanctity of historical perspective. Isabel's father, the stern, despotic country-town clergyman "who had never forgiven God," also belongs to a type that is passing away, and the modern reader hates him with the healthy American impulse against tyranny that the children of Puritanic New Englanders and Middle Staters scarcely knew.

The narrative carries Isabel into experiences at an Arizona army post in a country infested by Indians, and old army men and women will read with great interest of the familiar life they once lived, and of an engagement with the Indians, in which the author's kinship with army men can be guessed on account of her thorough knowledge of the military conditions of the times, the governmental stupidity which lost the nation many valuable lives, and the military technic of the engagement with the Indians.

The author, whose name is not familiar in the realm of fiction, is plainly a practiced writer, and although her book, like that written by her heroine, "marches, but does not soar," it carries the reader along with the interest that attaches to realities. For the country childhood, the boarding-school and co-educational university experiences, the life in a college town and at an army post are all told with that tone of truth, albeit rather sober in effect, which makes the book seem a reflection of life; all except the climax. The reader feels a little rebellious when a young and beautiful woman who is enjoying a congenial, intellectual comradeship with a fine man who loves her, and whom she is extremely near to loving, rejects his love because of her fidelity to her husband's memory. However, perhaps this end constitutes an artistic adherence to the sober, Puritanic tone of the book.

ISABEL STIRLING. By Evelyn Schuyler Schaeffer. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Day Before Yesterday.

Maitland Armstrong died two years ago and now we have a sort of autobiography—perhaps diary would be the better word—edited by his daughter, a book substantial in size, but printed in unusually large and comfortable type. Mr. Armstrong was first a painter and later on he became known for his stained-glass designs and manufacture. He served as consul-general to Italy and was United States Commissioner of Fine Arts at the Paris Exposition of 1878. He does not seem to have intended the publication of these diary leaves, and perhaps here we have an explanation of their excellence. He met a great many interesting people and he tells us about them interestingly and with a carefully sustained economy that seldom strays into the irrelevant or the domestic. Indeed there are few books of its kind that are so uniformly bright or that show so clear a recognition of the things that are pleasing or important.

DAY BEFORE YESTERDAY. By Maitland Armstrong. Edited by his daughter, Margaret Armstrong. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Morale.

Dr. G. Stanley Hall is so visible—there seems no other suitable word—that it is necessary to give to his book something more than the casual notice that its scanty virtues deserve. For here we seem to have an epitome of the intellectual failings of the day, its superficialities, its carelessness, its lack of thoroughness, and—it must be added sadly—its self-conceit. What shall we say of an author with Dr. Hall's claims to scholarship who permits so many glaring errors to creep into his Latin and French quotations and who seems to have searched the dictionary for unusual words in preference to their simpler equivalents?

Dr. Hall has his preferences and his antipathies. His preferences seem to be for anything and for everything that by any stretch of the imagination can be called scientific and for anything and everything that seems to belong peculiarly to this period in contradistinction to all others. His antipathies are against Christianity and all other forms of religion and thought that are not materialistic. All these are outworn and unworthy of attention. Henceforth we shall depend, not upon conscience as a moral guide, but upon some "mysterious, developmental urge, entelechy, will-to-live, elan vital, horme, libido, nissus, or by whatever name it be called." The humanity of the future will look to the biologist and the physiologist for whatever he may need of ethics, and the Ten Commandments will hide their diminished heads in favor of punch, pep, and jazz. In pursuance of his theme Dr. Hall wanders over the whole field of contemporary action and thought. Nothing is omitted, and if sometimes his snap judgments—and all his judgments are snap—surprisingly commend themselves by a certain homely common sense, we must regretfully attribute it to a mind trained in acrobatics rather than to anything resembling scholarship or actual comprehension. When Dr. Hall expresses the hope that his book will be accepted in our institutions of learning in place of the types of ethics now in use he displays a sanguine but not a prophetic temperament.

MORALE, THE SUPREME STANDARD OF LIFE AND CONDUCT. By G. Stanley Hall. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

Poems by Henry Van Dyke.

Here we have a volume of nearly six hundred pages of Dr. Van Dyke's poems, described as "a new and revised edition with many hitherto uncollected." The letterpress is of comfortable size and widely spaced and the book as a whole makes a handsome addition to the library shelf.

Dr. Van Dyke's poems are so widely known and so deservedly popular that nothing beyond a note of record seems to be needed. At the same time an edition so complete and so compact as this serves to emphasize a characteristic that has been by no means unnoticed. One wonders how it is that poems usually so faultless in construction and often so musical can yet be so conventional in thought. Nowhere do we find an idea that arrests the attention, that definitely arouses either hospitality or hostility or that provokes doubt or discussion. Dr. Van Dyke rarely writes a line of verse with which any human being can disagree, and while it can hardly be said that the task of the poet is to provoke disagreement, it seems none the less to be true that he who speaks in such a way as to arouse no disagreement has said nothing at all.

Briefer Reviews.

"Songs of Dogs," collected and arranged by Robert Frothingham (Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.65), is a compact anthology of the best poems that have ever been written about dogs. It makes a charming little volume.

"Business Letters Made Easy," by Paul W. Kearney (Edward J. Clode), is not merely a volume of sample letters. It is described as "a brief but comprehensive study of the principles which naturally simplify the art of handling the day's mail."

A compact and practical aid to the linguist will be found in "Spanish," by Edouard Dumois, M. A. (Edward J. Clode). The author's method seems admirably adapted to the acquisition of conversational Spanish. Moreover, it contains a competent vocabulary.

An unusually good story of Mayflower days written for young people will be found in "The Young Pilgrims," by Charles Herbert, and published by the J. B. Lippincott Company. In addition to many colored plates of unusual excellence there are line illustrations on nearly every page.

"The Land of the Great Out-of-Doors," by Robert Livingston (Houghton Mifflin Company), is the story of Pen and Penny, a little brother and sister who move to the country when they are five and six years of age. It describes life in the country, with its various activities changing with the seasons. Children tell in their own way of the animals on the farm and in the woods, and there are chapters on sports, picnics, etc.

"John Martin's Big Book for Little Folk" is very big indeed and it contains every variety of suitable food for the young reader. There are illustrations—many of them colored—upon nearly every page, and the letterpress consists of a delightful medley of stories, verse, and music. Here assuredly is treasure trove for children. The publisher is the Houghton Mifflin Company and the price is $3.50.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

Mr. Whiting Williams, steel executive and authority on labor morale, was away from his desk for seven months last year. He spent that period working as a laborer in American mines and mills. He adopted the worker's identity with the worker's overalls. He lived the worker's life, wrestled with the worker's problems. Mr. Williams kept a diary during that period. This diary, after clarification and editing, has been published in book form by Charles Scribner's Sons under the title "What's On the Worker's Mind."

Colonel Repington, the famous military correspondent of the London Times and Morning Post, has created a decided sensation in Great Britain by the publication of his war diary. For the past month the British papers have been filled with comments on the colonel's "indiscretions" in revealing so frankly the inner story of the military and diplomatic history of the conflict.

William Lyon Phelps, the literary critic and Lampson Professor of English at Yale, has recently said that "it is pleasant to record that in the front rank of American novelists we find four women, who shall be named in alphabetical order. The big four are Dorothy Canfield, Zona Gale, Anne Sedgwick, Edith Wharton."

John Pollock, late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, who went to Russia in March, 1915, to do relief work among the war refugees and escaped from the Russia of the Bolsheviks in February, 1919, has an interesting story to tell of actual existence in the land of the Soviets. In "The Bolshevik Adventure," just published by E. P. Dutton & Co., he tells his story with unforgettable vividness.

Accepting the Universe.

In spite of the deprecatory note of certain commentators we can see no reason why Mr. John Burroughs should not attempt to solve the evolutionary riddle of the universe nor why we should confine ourselves to the views of a certain school of scientists for our evolutionary theories just as we confine ourselves to the grocer when we want cheese or to the postoffice when we want stamps. Any man who can look intelligently upon his own inner processes or upon the general processes of nature outside of himself is competent and indeed compelled to ask himself the meaning of them. It is not in the least necessary that he should know the latest facts about the amoeba nor that he should prostrate himself before the professor of biology. Incidentally it is a little strange that amid all the chatter about democracy we should adopt an attitude toward the scientist so like that of the German civilian toward a member of the general staff. Indeed we are by no means sure that the scientific "outsider" may not sometimes see the best of the game.

When Mr. Burroughs talks about Nature he means the totality of existence. The theological God has no place in his scheme. For him there is no supernatural. It seems to him that the universe is moving on toward a goal by some power inherent in itself, a power that has no favorites and that is indifferent to our ideas of right and wrong. Nature, he says, is just as much on the side of the rat as of the cat. She is single-eyed in pursuit of her goal. All the phenomena around us are parts of her plan, and they would be seen to be orderly if we had a sufficient sense of the relativities. Whatever in the exercise of human free will acts retardingly upon the plan of the universe is evil. Whatever accelerates that plan is good.

Perhaps it would be easy to find inconsistencies in the author's argument. In the main they are due to a slight shifting of the point of view and they do not matter. The book as a whole remains a notable piece of broad-gauge and constructive thinking, and one by no means without its helpful hearing upon the cultural side of the individual life.

Relativity.

It was gratifying to find that the Einstein theory aroused much interest in America in spite of the fact that it seemed to have no possible bearing upon manufacture or commerce. But for a time our interest was checked. Einstein himself said that probably there were not a dozen men in the world who could understand his theory, but he must now have somewhat modified that opinion, seeing that he has written a book addressed to the non-mathematical reader, or at least to the reader whose mathematics are not much beyond the high school variety. It would be out of place here to attempt a summary of the Einstein theory, and particularly in view of the fact that this authoritative book is now available. It must suffice to say that it is written with a fine lucidity and that no one of average intelligence need hesitate to read it.

"THE LITTLE WHOPPER."

The Curran was filled almost if not quite to capacity on its opening night with the crowd who always keeps tab on New York successes. "The Little Whopper" is musical comedy, but it has a special claim on the attention because of the Friml music and because Otto Harbach wrote the book.

It is one of the pieces that has a considerable plot; always something to be thankful for. The cast reads like that of a normal farce-comedy, and the musical numbers fit in aptly enough to tickle the spectator agreeably. There is a pretty, wistful touch of sentiment to Friml's melodious numbers, and Harbach provides amusing situations and witty dialogue. In fact the main part of the entertainment is provided by an intrinsically amusing piece, which fortunately is set off by a particularly pleasing company, the songs, dancing, and costumes being incidental, as they ought to be. And the humor of the piece is clean and cleanly presented, even though there is a marriage mix-up, and even a bedroom glimpsed for a brief moment. But we are spared all grossness of suggestion.

The opening scene is at a girls' boarding-school, in which the youth of the girls—for the chorus, like the majority of the chorus girls of the present day, is almost juvenile in age—tallies very aptly with the situation. In this first act—which, like the second, is divided up into several scenes—we are treated to a delightful bit of burlesque of an uncouthly optimistic school mistress, by Sally McRee, who to our sorrow was obliged by the course of the plot to retire from our view too, too early in the performance. We hoped, but vainly, that the schoolmistress' suspicions would induce her to invade "Room 808" in Scene Second, but it was not to be. Miss McRee, by the way, did an extremely good bit of burlesque dancing before the exigencies of the piece ravished her from our yearning gaze.

But there were others. Marie Dilworth, the little blonde who played Kittie, is a clever little piece of capability, with her innocently mischievous countenance, her eyes of naughtily guileless blue, her quick conveyance of the snap in the dialogue, and her spontaneously joyous rhythm of movement. Hazel Flint, the pretty brunette girl playing beside her, although not gifted with as pleasing singing voice, sang with expression and was dowered with that suggestion of an engaging genuineness which, probably, had prompted her selection for the rôle of the girl who hated to tell whoppers; even little ones.

Burt Hall played opposite Marie Dilworth, and like her brought out all the grace and humor of the lines. Mr. Hall's speaking as well as his singing voice did not have a firm carrying quality, and yet it had a wooing minor tone which made us enjoy his musical numbers. Mr. William Gates was duly ingenious in conveying impetuous youthful love, and William Friend was the indispensable comedian playing the rôle of the indispensable valet. And mighty well he did it, too, for he is the kind that does not have to be a buffoon, because his delightful, unforced humor is so genuine and so unobtrusively but unerringly conveyed.

There are still two more whose good qualities it is my agreeable duty to chronicle, Jerome Merrick and Mildred Beverly playing the trusting parents to the truthful girl who has told her first "little whopper." This pair, like William Friend, gave to their work that reassuring finish that we occasionally, or oftener perhaps than occasionally, see in pieces of this kind because they can get tried and trusted players for the maturer rôles, horrowing them from their niches in a more legitimate line of work.

The music made a perpetually agreeable accompaniment to the action, although the voices of the chorus girls are rather raw in quality. But Friml puts a haunting quality into his music, even although it is the light and ephemeral music of musical comedy, and there will be sure to be a demand for records of "You'll Dream and I'll Dream."

"ROBIN HOOD" REVIVED.

They are giving the familiar old favorite a good production at the Columbia. Musically the performance is excellent. The performers are young, the voices are sweet and full, and in costume and scenic appointment everything is more than satisfactory.

But after this tour I have an idea that "Robin Hood" will retire to its long rest in the graveyard. Perhaps the rising generation may not agree, but even they have heard enough of the popular numbers to have discovered that they belong to the domain of ephemeral popular light opera.

Delightful indeed they were to us at one time, but they seem, like the whole piece, to have become a little frayed about the edges. The humor has become mechanical, the romance a thing of the scene-shifter's contrivance. It almost seems, indeed, as if the old story of Robin Hood and his merry outlaws had been cheated of all its forest mystery. All the characters of tradition are there, moving mechanically forward by turns into the spotlight. For the opera begins to seem like a costume concert, so carefully have the claims of each voice been considered.

There are the first and second soprano, the first and second tenor, the contralto, a couple of basses, an ornate haritone, and so on. And in the present production the musical quality has been well considered.

Elsie Thiede, tall and pretty, has a fresh voice of appropriate beauty for Maid Marian's well-known lyrics. Betty Baxter as Alan-a-Dale sings well, although, alas! the young lady forgets herself so little that to the audience she always remains herself; and why does she not sing "Oh Promise Me" more simply?

Harry Longstreet as Little John presents the gallant figure of a good-looking young man who lives up, in his costumes, to his straight legs and good figure. A little inflexible in voice, movement, and action, yet the young man has the equipment that won for him in "Brown October Ale" the highest and most emphatic encore of the evening. Perhaps the subject might have counted, suggestive as it is of appeasing a forevermore thirst, but still the singer won a personal return from his hearers.

William Degan in the "Nine Tailors" song rumbled triumphantly away down in the howels of the earth as Eugene Cowles used to do, and there were other fine bass voices beside William White's to hear him company.

Tom Burton is an experienced comedian who gave a robustious presentation of the old Sheriff-brought-up-to-date. Mr. Burton knows his business, and made his audience laugh with a modernized edition of the jokes. But nevermore will they laugh at the Sheriff as they did of yore, when Barnabee funned about the stage in his hale seventies.

Albert Parr also knows his business. He played Robin Hood, but he suggested an Italian opera singer taking up light opera for a change. Mr. Parr's voice is not as young and fresh as those of the majority of the company, but he is a well-trained singer and knows the ropes.

Other characters—George Olsen's Guy of Gisborne, Mary Baker's Annabel, and Madeline Hartford's Dame Durden—were played on traditional lines, and might easily pass for revived editions of the people of the past that we have seen in the rôles.

A curious effect the old piece gives of going well entirely mechanically. Perhaps the stage director is the type that eliminates individuality. But nobody seemed to stand out of a chalk-marked spot and show an independent and capturing personality.

Nevertheless the performance has been so carefully directed, the voices are so good, the costuming, generally speaking, is so satisfactory, and in individual cases—the baritone, who lives up to his rather too self-aware manly charms, the soprano, who is a dresser—so fresh and handsome that it seems like hyper-criticism to pronounce a performance that is on the surface full of go to be slightly mechanical in its general effect.

AT THE MAITLAND.

This week Mr. Maitland is affording us the opportunity—and one that should not be passed over by students of modern drama—of seeing one of Galsworthy's most sorrowfully realistic plays. It is the sad story of a weakling caught in the pitiless gin of the law and crushed utterly. The remarkable quality of this play is the calm, judicial attitude of the author. Galsworthy, although born within the ranks of English patricians, is a man who has a remarkably deep insight into the sufferings and temptations of the very poor. Plainly he believes that the state does not do its duty by them, but he is no self-constituted reformer. What he does is to present the problem. No solution is offered, but the thinking world is inferentially invited to consider the question, and—again by inference—the state to do something helpful and merciful in the way of making the weaklings of society its wards.

In presenting this problem for the consideration of society Galsworthy has taken the utmost pains to avoid sentimentality of any kind. He refuses to depict flint-hearted employers or brutal officers of the law. The wretched criminal, after he has suffered his punishment and become a ticker-of-leave man, is offered his chance. That he fails is not alone due to his own weakness, Galsworthy wishes us to realize, but because, when the offender against law has expiated his offense and returns to society, society disowns him.

Galsworthy shows that the sincere and protective affection felt by Folder for Ruth is so much to his credit that there is something wrong in conditions which prohibit the woman's escape from her union with a cruel and brutal husband, and the possibility of the two poor derelicts building up, out of their barren lives, a home in which they might enjoy the halm of legitimate affection.

Also, the heart-breaking scene revealing the sufferings of a sensitive, nervous, hysterical prisoner thrown back upon himself in solitary confinement aims at a mitigation of punishment so cruel.

Mr. Maitland in the rôle of William Folder was at his best. He submerged himself in the rôle to such good effect that he carried his sympathetic audience with him in depicting the weakness, the indecision, the vain strivings, the hysterical out-leapings of a temperament not duly controlled, and the unendurable sufferings of a man not so much at odds with the world as borne down by the onward, resistless movement of a society without mercy for the futile and the weak.

Mr. Maitland had also molded his group of players into giving an appropriately sympathetic depiction of the other characters. Nobody in the play is heartless, and the men express that quiet usedness to the inevitable movements of legal justice and to the resultant sufferings, which is necessary in order to give the spirit of the play.

There are at intervals in the drama momentary movements of pity which the pitying spirit of the on-looker hails with relief: the manly compassion of young How—very sympathetically depicted by Mr. Allard—and the constitutional kindness of old Cokeson—commendably rendered by Mr. Horton—whose unwearying pity becomes beautiful and heart-softening at the end when he speaks to the afflicted girl, crying out her sorrow over the dead with words so simple and moving that one's eyes involuntarily moisten in sympathy.

"Oh, my pretty!" she cries, as she looks on the broken body of the young suicide; and in equally simple words the old clerk expresses the tenderness of a heart that the world had never hardened: "Don't cry, my dear. He is with the gentle Jesus."

That is a beautiful conception of Galsworthy's; that character of old Cokeson, so simply, almost casually, yet so perfectly conveyed; and it is all the more appealing because of the matter-of-fact exterior of the systematic old cog in the business system whose duty was always faithfully done.

Ruth is merely a companion picture to Folder; loving, yet weak in her way as he in his. Mildred Cates gave it with due emotional stress, and other good points in the performance were the advocate's plea by Mr. Allard, the rigidly moulded figure of the elder How, by Arthur Clare, and the quietly-played rôles of the detective and the prison governor, enacted by Richard Lancaster.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

What a Theatre Should Be.

A good theatre (writes George Jean Nathan in The Smart Set) should be like the library of an amiable and cultivated man; it should possess all the virtues of such a library, and all the pleasant little vices. It should not be devoted largely to the classics; a library composed largely of the classics is the mark of the nouveau or the dusty head.

It should display what is best in the old, for that is always fresh; it should display what is best of the new, for that is always arresting; it should contain also the agreeable unimportant trifles that go to chase away thought and soberness with loud, low chuckles. It should be a theatre, like the library, upon whose shelves stand in juxtaposition reflection and belly laughter, poetry and gay, low fig stuff, wit and the torpedo hat, imagination, honest sentiment, searching comment, and fair and lovely frontispieces.

It would show upon its shelves in close proximity Aristophanes and "Anatol," Bahr and Bickel, Corneille and Irene Castle. Feydeau and the "Follies," Goethe and Lady Gregory, Hauptmann and Raymond Hitchcock, Ibsen and "The Importance of Being Earnest," "Justice" and Justice Johnston, Molière and Kathleen Martyn, "Othello" and "Oh, Boy," Rostand and Rip, Shakespeare and Sam Scribner's Burlesquers.

It should, like his library, take the man's culture for granted. It should interest, divert, and amuse, not educate. It should, with its fond remembrances and reflections, be as an old trunk in the attic of his mind or, with its lively beauties and humors, as a sudden cocktail.

The coat of arms of Nova Scotia will be changed to indicate the industrial development not signified by the present standard. The curious fact is that the coat of arms granted by Charles I in 1625 may be restored, since it is more appropriate.

University Mound Reservoir

"The spot is one of the dreariest and windiest on the Peninsula, the sparse population declaring that on no day in the year are its rough slopes unswept by roistering breezes. No car comes within a mile of it and the only signs of life in the neighborhood are the distant view of the city, the flop of the blinds in the few occupied windows of the Old Ladies Home and the whizzing sails of the garden windmills on the flat beneath."—Press Description, July 31, 1885.

University Mound Reservoir is on a plateau south of Silver Avenue, directly in front of the Lick Old Ladies Home, which occupies the building long ago erected for University College. This reservoir was completed in August, 1885.

By means of a 44-inch pipeline with a capacity of 26 million gallons daily, it receives water from Crystal Springs Lake in San Mateo County and from the Alameda sources. This water flows by gravity, traveling 17 miles. The storage capacity of University Mound is 37 million gallons.

Built at an elevation of 168 feet, it supplies the "low service district" of San Francisco.

"One of the carriages broke down en route to the ceremonies the day the water was turned in, with the following results:

"Harry Dam's eye-glasses cloped with Engineer Schussler's hat and Frank Pixley's lavender-colored chapeau of the stove-pipe pattern sought to punch a hole through the roof of the vehicle. Mr. Pixley rolled out on top of the press reporters."—Morning Call, August 6, 1885.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Alcazar Theatre.

The policy of the Alcazar is steadily progressive. "The Cave Girl," next week's comedy, by George Middleton and Guy Bolton, authors of "Polly with a Past," is their very newest work. A millionaire's party live luxuriously at Caribou Lodge. The cave girl is detected pilfering from the storehouse to prevent the disillusionment of her foster-father, whose pet theory is that nature provides every necessity for primitive life. The humor is delicious when she smashes up the boat that is to take them back to civilization and their quarters hurn down, leaving them all a "community" for the professor's experiment. There are melodramatic moments, a swift current of love interest, and a never-ceasing flow of fun. Elwyn Harvey personates the self-reliant cave girl, Dudley Ayres the ardent wooer, Charles Yule his arrogant millionaire father, Rafael Brunetto the professor, Emily Pinter a dashing widow, Edna Peckham—well-known light opera prima donna—the city belle, Ben Erway the picturesque Canadian, Baptiste, with other favorites in congenial rôles. The musical direction at the Alcazar will be assumed by Theodore Bendix, whose programmes will be selected to follow the mood and atmosphere of the plays.

"The Eternal Magdelene" will have first Alcazar staging on Sunday, November 14th. Julia Arthur scored a great triumph in Robert McLaughlin's daring and vivid exposition of a social problem as old as the world and even more vital now.

The Columbia Theatre.

The fine production of the De Koven light opera, "Robin Hood," now being offered at the Columbia Theatre by the Ralph Dunbar organization has taken San Francisco by storm. The De Koven masterpiece has never been better sung, taking the cast as a whole. Elsie Thiede as Maid Marian shows her delightful soprano to fine advantage and Albert Parr as Robin Hood leaves the audience with one of the best impressions made by any singer heard here in light opera. Tom Burton as the Sheriff of Nottingham, Harry Longstreet as Little John, William Degan as Will Scarlett, and charming Betty Baxter as Alan-a-Dale are among the excellent cast sent here to charm theatre-goers. The three acts are elaborately staged.

David Belasco's production of the Willard Mack drama, "Tiger Rose," will be the next attraction at the Columbia Theatre, opening a two weeks' engagement on Monday, November 15th. A Belasco production is always welcome and it is said that he has achieved a particularly fine triumph in staging this intense drama from the pen of the prolific playwright.

The Curran Theatre.

Much interest is being manifested by the theatre-going public of this city over the engagement at the Curran Theatre of last season's biggest musical success, Harbach and Friml's musical comedy exquisite, "The Little Whopper." The second and final week of the engagement will begin tomorrow evening.

No musical play has been presented in many seasons that has attained such an enormous degree of popularity as was attested last season by its phenomenal run of an entire year at the Casino Theatre, New York.

"The Little Whopper" is seen in this city with the same complete production of two acts and five scenes that characterized its engagement in New York. The scenery and wardrobe are claimed to be among the most beautiful and extensive and the cast and chorus have been carefully selected from among Broadway's best, which includes Marie Dilworth, Hazel Flint, William Gaston, Holly Hollis, William Friend, and others.

The Maitland Playhouse.

Oscar Wilde's comedy, "The Importance of Being Earnest," will be given at the Maitland Playhouse this coming week. Director Maitland has selected this performance as a contrast to the dramas of the past several weeks and the change in the bill should provide much entertainment for the Maitland patrons.

"The Importance of Being Earnest" is a clever, satirical comedy, full of lines that amuse as well as entertain and with a capable professional cast to do it justice the play should be one of the most popular of the season at the Stockton Street house.

It was done last year at the Maitland and the success of the comedy was such as to persuade Mr. Maitland to give it again for the playgoers.

For the remainder of the week, closing with Saturday matinee and Saturday night performance, the Maitland will give "Justice."

Symphony Orchestra.

Tomorrow afternoon in the Curran Theatre the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra will repeat the programme offered yesterday, in which Horace Britt appeared as soloist. He will play Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," for cello and orchestra, a work which made a profound impression when first produced here two seasons ago. The symphony will be the beautiful Fifth in E minor of Tschaiikowsky, while the programme will open with Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture.

Next Sunday, November 14th, the next popular concert will be given. Alfred Hertz has selected a programme admirably balanced between the classical and modern schools, the former being represented by the Andante con moto movement from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. This is in keeping with the policy of including at least one movement from a symphony on each popular programme.

Great interest has been aroused by the announcement of the engagement of the great Russian pianist, Josef Lhevinne, to appear with the Symphony Orchestra. He will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto at the fourth pair of concerts, November 19th and 21st.

The Orpheum.

A composite of all the attributes that spell success on the stage will be brought to the Orpheum next week by the Barr Twins, Evelyn and Gertrude. These two charming girls have become fixed stars in the firmament. Evelyn and Gertrude Barr are liberally endowed with that great essential, beauty. Another quality of theirs is voice. Of course each girl dances. They are seen this season in song and dance, presented in an elaborate and artistic frame, which they term "A Riot of Color." Each song is presented with an entire change of stage drapery and in different gowns.

A comedy-drama will be "$5000 a Year." Robert Hyman and Virginia Mann are the stars in this brilliant performance.

If "blues" happen to be about town, warn them that Frank Kellam and Patricia O'Dare will get them. Chasing blues is the specialty of this singing, talking, and dancing duo.

The girl question and the talk a man makes about his girl is the basis of the comedy George Bobbe and Eddie Nelson will offer. Bright and breezy personalities help the two to put over their act in a happy manner.

Léon Varvara will show the various steps in the evolution or making of a pianist. Pianists may be born, but they also are made. From the time the small boy with one finger drums out "one, two, three, four," until he becomes a virtuoso, the piano spells work. Varvara will depict the various stages which result in the finished musician.

Ed Lord and Margie Fuller will present "Bits of This and That." Their songs, dialogue, and dances are particularly well suited. They are clever and their material is bright and snappy.

"Varieties of 1920," with the same excellent cast which presents it this week and the two capable comedians, Glenn and Jenkins, with their "Working for the Railroad," will hold over. Topics of the Day, International News, and Orpheum Orchestra will furnish their bits toward making afternoons, and evenings at the Orpheum all the more pleasant.

Players Theatre.

The fall repertory season at the Players Theatre commences its sixth week on Monday evening. Tolstoy's drama, "Fedya" will be given twice next week, on Wednesday and Friday evenings. This is one of the most powerful dramas which the Players have ever presented, the colorful scenes in the gipsies and the underground dive scene making a lasting impression. William S. Rainey has never given a finer portrayal than the dissolute Fedya. "Ruddigore," the musical hit of the season, will be sung tonight and Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday evenings. William S. Rainey will sing the tenor rôle of Richard Dauntless on Friday evening. An excellent company of forty-five do full justice to Sullivan's tuneful score. The principals include Reginald Travers, Miriam Elkus, Mabel Gump, Benjamin Purrington, Len Barnes, Jane Parent, Carl Kroenke, Emanuel Rosenthal, Carolyn Kroenke, and Ruth Bates.

The Savoy Theatre.

"Way Down East" will positively close with the performance on Sunday evening, November 14th. Never in the history of the motion-picture industry has a record been made that can in any way come near to the record that "Way Down East" has made in San Francisco. This will be the last chance for San Franciscans to see the supreme triumph of the screen. There will be a matinee daily up to and including the last day, which is Sunday, the 14th.

Theodore Bendix.

Theodore Bendix, a composer and conductor of international reputation, assumes musical direction at the Alcazar next Sunday. He is a native of Detroit, comes from a musical family, and is a lineal descendant of Felix Mendelssohn. His brother, Max Bendix, will be remembered as conductor at the San Francisco Exposition. While still in his teens Theodore Bendix conducted for Booth, Barrett, Irving, Mansfield, Lotta, Mme. Janaschick, and other famous stars. At the age of twenty-three he conducted the Gilbert and Sullivan operas when originally produced in this country at Boston's famous Globe Theatre. Later he conducted the orchestra at historic Drury Lane Theatre when "Ben Hur" had its first London production. Mr. Bendix has been musical director at the Hudson, Harris, Cort, and other leading New York theatres controlled by Klaw & Erlanger, the Shuberts, Oliver Morosco, and numerous producing managers. He was the first to give interpretation of good music in vaudeville. For

As a composer of light characteristic music Mr. Bendix enjoys international popularity. He will play one of his numbers at the Alcazar every week and his orchestral programmes will no doubt find wide public appeal, as they will follow the mood and atmosphere of the play.

VANITY FAIR.

Getting Even.

Now doth wily Man
Cunningly indorse Woman for political office,
Chortling in his sleeve,
Wagging his head at his cluhmates,
Snickering derisively as he murmurs:
"Ha, ha! Long hath she made our existence one of nagging,
Accusing us, bitterly of smoking to ruin the best curtains,
Of tracking in mud on the new Bagdad rug (Which our own hard-earned shekels had paid for!)
Of gormandizing in the matter of Welsh rabbit,
Of wasteful squandering of coin on the horses,
Of fondness for the Kitty at green-covered tables where lodgemates foregather—
All these, and then some!
But wait!
In dark-purple revenge have we indorsed her candidacy,
Picturing how she will set her new hat on straight,
in complacence,
Observing that through merit alone should all office be gained!
She will go to head, a reputable, obscure, sterling citizen of integrity,
To wake, finding out that the Opposition Papers have sifted her past, Sketching her as a grafter, time-server, tuft-hunter, profiteer, proved guilty of seditious utterances, of sabotage, wabbling, quitting; one whose ancestors were hanged for sheep-stealing, who has cornered the market in maple fudge, a caucus-stuffer, an understudy of Nantippe, a Benedict Arnold in sport skirts!"

Wait! —Ella A. Fanning in New York Times.

There seems to be something a little childish in the crusade against the restaurants now in progress in the great and enlightened city of Boston. The Boston authorities ought to know better, and probably they do know better, but then this is election time, and the vote of the congenial idiot is just as valuable as the vote of the philosopher. This is what we call democracy, and if we were on better terms with the angels we should know how they weep about it.

A series of elaborate calculations by the aforesaid authorities have shown that a ham sandwich costs 6.29 cents. No calculation whatever is needed to show that it sells for 30 cents, which is 399 per cent. profit. Beans and brown bread cost 9 cents and sell for 35.
A pie costs from 46 to 48 cents. The restaurant man cuts it into seven pieces and sells each piece for 20 cents. And so it goes, as Mr. Dooley would say. The Boston authorities, doubtless with an eye to the ballot-box, have taken the restaurant-keeper by the scruff of the neck and threaten to douse him in the horse trough or its modern equivalent, unless he forthwith reduces his prices.

Now the restaurant-keeper does not sell ham sandwiches, nor beans and brown bread nor pie. The food is a single item in a service that includes a well-laid table, the use of all the necessary appliances for eating, the ministrations of a waiter, and a dozen other things.
In many cases it includes lavatory, a rest room for women, and an orchestra. To represent the restaurant-keeper as a shopkeeper who sells sandwiches is grossly unjust. It may be that in some cases he is a profiteer.
Probably he is. We have yet to hear of any one who has the chance to be a profiteer and who has failed to take it. Profiteering seems to consist of selling your commodity in the highest market, whether your commodity happens to be your labor or furs and costumes.
We can all abstain from buying when we think that the price is too high, and actually there is no other remedy. If we are going to put all the profiteers in jail there won't be enough of us left to act as jailors. Moreover, the jailors would at once strike for higher pay, and then they would be profiteers, too. And we may note that the cry against the profiteer comes particularly loudly from Eastern cities whose squalid and licentious extravagances have become a national scandal.

The restaurant-keepers are in no way disposed to plead guilty. They refuse to enter into the calculations of the price of a ham sandwich or to admit that they sell food as a postoffice sells stamps. They point out that their rents have been raised and that their wages account has increased inordinately.
Cutlery, silver, and linen have gone up in price. Everything has gone up in price, and what can they do but recoup themselves? The owner of a chain of lunchrooms and dining-rooms in Boston says that his firm is making practically nothing at the present time. The remedy, he says, is in the hands of the public.
The average customer selects the most costly things that he can find on the bill of fare.
He insists on having all the things that are cooked to order and looks with contempt upon the ordinary roasts. He wants turkey, ducks, chops, and steaks, and he seems to be governed in his choice, not by his preferences or tastes, but by his desire to spend money. Another caterer admits that the actual cost of the food is 41.64 cents on each dollar, but service alone costs 19 cents on the dollar and food for employees costs 7½ cents on the dollar, while rent, heat, light, silver, and linen

The remedy against the high-priced restaurant is the low-priced restaurant, and it can always be found. The price of clothing is falling and will soon fall much more in response to the refusal to pay the high prices. It is not nice to wear a shiny coat, or trousers that are rapidly becoming a festoon of ribbons, but a good many of us have had to do it, and with the most salutary results, not only upon prices, but upon our vanities. If we want to lower the restaurant check, or at least to make sure that it can not be lowered, the only way is to go somewhere else to eat or give up eating altogether. It is futile to appeal to an absurd law and no one knows this better than the authorities of Boston, who will probably cease their stage talk as soon as the election has settled their fate.

If any one wants, for purposes of illustration, a typical case of a dispute in which all the legal right is on one side and all the moral right on the other, he might take the dispute, which has just been made public, between Mr. Augustus John, the great painter, and Lord Leverhulme (says an editorial in the Manchester Guardian). Apparently Lord
Leverhulme got his portrait painted by Mr.
John, and then, finding it too large for a wall-space for which he had meant it, resumed the proceedings of infancy with the scissors and the illustrated papers, and cut the face out of the canvas. The head and front of his offending seem to have remained with him, while excess of zeal in a housekeeper sent the torn and bleeding trunk back to Mr.
John. It was one of the profound observations of Scott's Dugald Dalgetty that even the brute creation are found to be incensed against those "who intromit with their offspring"; much more so old a taker of his own part as Mr. John, whose hand has been red in the foray from the days when he first knocked all of a heap, as the French say, the burgesses of Liverpool at the time when, as a major, he defeated the whole British army on the question of shaving off his beard. Mr.
John might possibly have done best merely to send Lord Leverhulme a postcard with "Diamond, Diamond, thou little knowest what thou hast done," or some such amenity, on it. But who, as Macheth says, can be wise, amazed, temperate, and furious, all in a moment? So he seems to have written much as the rest of us, who are not gifted, would have done in like case. And Lord Leverhulme, under the stimulus of this letter, seems to have answered much as the rest of us would do, too. Had he not bought the picture? Shall he not do what he likes with his own?

The bottom fact of the case is that there is something in a work of art which, in the higher equity as distinct from law, you can not buy. Suppose Mr. John, for the sake of argument, as great a painter as his most ardent admirers believe; that is, a peer to Velasquez and Rembrandt. Suppose, too, this portrait of Lord Leverhulme to have been his masterpiece, the work on which the exact measure of his fame a hundred years hence would most depend. Whatever the law may allow, or courts award, the common fairness of mankind can not assent to the doctrine that one man may rightfully use his own rights of property in such a way as to silence or interrupt another in making so critical an appeal to posterity for recognition of his genius. The right to put up this appeal comes too near to those other fundamental personal rights the infringement of which is the essence of slavery. The position of a painter or sculptor, in respect of reputation, is in one way precarious. His works usually go right out of his hands. Even to see them he must go to other men's houses. A poet can at least keep a copy of his poems; even an etcher can keep a print of each of his plates. A portrait painter is, legally, as utterly dispossessed of his own work as a greengrocer is of his potatoes. And yet every one's perception tells him that these canvases, in which a rare mind has lodged so much of itself, are not as the potatoes are. They may be sold, but they should not be sold into utter servitude; they ought, in their new ownership, to enjoy undiminished their right to express the force that gave them birth; and in taking legal ownership of works of art a man should put it straight to himself that he is accepting the position of guardian, in some measure, to another man's reputation and that, in some little degree, his ownership partakes of the nature of a foster-parent's ownership of an adopted child. No doubt Lord Leverhulme acted without full knowledge of the interdependence of the various parts of a painting, and hoped that the head of a portrait could retain its value apart from the rest. Perhaps, too, he may not have realized that Mr. John is one of our hopes of cutting a respectable figure in history as an age with an art of its own. It is as easy for liberality and good intentions to run into trouble in the world of art as in the Isle of Lewis.

HUNTING FOSSILS IN CHINA.

Dr. J. G. Andersson of the Chinese Geological Survey has recently published a pamphlet with the title "Dragon Hunting in China."
The publication is not a wild tale about a brontosaurus still surviving in an underground lake in central China, and the American Museum of Natural History hasn't offered $5,000,000 for his capture dead or alive. Neither does it refer to the search for rare pottery antiques with the national emblem in various impossibly hideous forms, nor has it any obscure political significance. Perhaps you know, as a few people do, that fossil bones and teeth of extinct animals are called dragons' bones and dragons' teeth in China, and are a regular stock medicine in the Chinese pharmacopoeia.

Those who have kept in touch with the work of the American Museum of Natural History may recall that some years ago this institution obtained a small collection of fossil teeth and bones which had been purchased by a German traveler in Chinese drug shops, and their use as medicine was noted. They are in fact quite regularly and extensively used.
They are said to be a specific especially for diseases of the liver and for nervous disorders.

All of which sounds rather absurd, but perhaps it is not more worthless than a good many of the patent medicines and household remedies that we use so widely in the Western world. "Probably its chief value is as a "faith cure," the assimilating of portions of dragons inspiring the patient with some of their vigorous and energetic qualities. But also it is to be noted that the teeth and bones of animals, whether fossil or not, are chiefly composed of phosphate of lime, insoluble in their natural condition, but by steeping in a weak acid they can be partly converted into a soluble acid phosphate. In this form they would have the same tonic effect as the acid phosphates sometimes prescribed by physicians, and more often taken at the soda fountain without any prescription. It would seem then that, taken in sour wine, the dragons' teeth may really have some medicinal value.

Why fossil bones should be used instead of fresh ones is not so obvious, unless it be that as they have all the gelatin and organic matter removed they may be more easily crushed and dissolved.

However much or little this use of fossils has served to reduce the prevalence of insanity or liver complaint among the Chinese, it interferes seriously with Dr. Andersson's scientific researches.

For as a consequence the fossils have a very considerable commercial value, and those who know where to find them are very secretive about it. Not only is it impossible to trace the localities from which the material in the markets has come, but any promising localities or prospects are likely to be claimed by the owner of the land or raided by inquisitive natives, with the result of ruining the specimens for scientific purposes by breaking up the skulls to extract the more valuable teeth. Dr. Andersson has had to start a campaign of education to teach the Chinese that good fossil skulls are worth more to the foreign geologist than their shattered fragments will bring at the local drug store.

These Chinese fossils are of very considerable interest and importance to science if only they were better known. For various reasons scientists have come to believe in recent years that the cradle of the human race, the part of the world where—if anywhere—man really evolved out of the animal world and acquired those qualities of mind and body which have set him apart in a higher plane of existence, was somewhere in Central Asia. Only after he had acquired that dominance over the rest of nature did man invade and overrun the rest of the Old World; and still more recently the New World. This theory is believed to be equally true of many races of the lower animals now widely distributed over the world.

So far as this view is correct, it is evidently useless to look for the fossil ancestors of man, the earlier stages in his evolution from the apes, in America, or even in Europe. The most promising fields for such finds will be in the regions nearest to his centre of evolution and dispersal, that is to say, in China and the great interior of the Chinese Empire, and westward through Tibet and Turkestan to the shores of the Caspian Sea. All this part of Asia is practically unexplored for fossils.
If the Chinese Geological Survey can continue and extend its explorations, we may learn from them a great deal about the ancestry of man and of many of the lower animals.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A rather green-looking chap went into one of the department stores the other day, and sauntering up to the counter where dozens of men's caps were displayed he looked carefully through the stock, but seemed unable to find what he wanted. "Just what kind of a cap are you looking for?" asked the salesman at length. "Well," said the youth, "I bought me a motorcycle the other day, and I thought I'd like one of those caps with a peak at the back."

A big laugh is going the rounds at the expense of a certain painless dentist. Seems a darky woman who had been suffering for some time with a toothache finally got up courage enough to go to this dentist to have it extracted. But the minute he touched the tooth Dinah began to roar. "What are you making such a noise about? Don't you know I'm a painless dentist?" demanded that worthy as he hastily closed the windows. "Mebbe you is, but I aint," howled Dinah.

Bert was sixty, and Jed possibly ten years his junior. Bert hadn't "joined the church," but Jed's deep voice thrilled with emotion, and stamped him as one of the elect as he entreated Bert to "give himself to Gawd." Bert listened while Jed cited various instances of narrow escapes from horrible deaths of those whose "jinin'" was the next act after the click of the Grim Reaper's scythe was out of their ears. Jed grew more and more personal, and finally he prodded Bert's chest with a sinewy forefinger and fairly shouted, "Look at yer! Nearly sixty, on the edge of the grave, so to speak, and not jined yet! Aint yer afeared to take such a chance on the hereafter?" Bert shifted his toothpick meditatively. "Gee, Jed, you ought to 'a' been a minister; you've got that holy boldness that lets you talk right out about anybody's business."

"It is remarkable," said Mr. Gruntler, "how mean some people are. I had with me on a fishing trip two friends, who evidently were familiar with my reputation as an angler. Before starting one of them made the following suggestion: 'We will agree that the first man that catches a fish must treat the crowd.' I assented to this, and we started. Now, those two fellows both had a bite, and were too mean to pull them up." "I suppose you lost, then?" remarked the friend. "Oh, no," replied Mr. Gruntler, "I didn't have any bait on my hook."

William Lyon Phelps, professor of English literature at Yale, declares he gets credit for only 25 per cent. of the after-dinner speeches he actually makes. "Every time I accept an invitation to speak I really make four addresses," he says. "First is the speech I prepare in advance. That is pretty good. Second is the speech I really make. Third is the speech I make on the way home, which is the best of all, and fourth is the speech the newspapers next morning say I made, which bears no relation to any of the others."

A ballplayer of very humble station in life joined a club and showed great natural talents. He soon made a place for himself in the league team and the day came when he had to make a long railway journey to take part in a match. Lunch was served on the train, and his eyes opened wider and wider as each course was placed before him. After the sweet had been served the steward asked: "Will you take cheese, sir?" "Cheese," he exclaimed. "Haven't you anything else? I can get cheese at home!"

It was a country town and he was making preparations for flitting—the fourth removal in about twelve months. The parson happened to be passing and remarked: "What—moving again, John?" "Yes, sir," replied John. "You are taking your poultry, too, I see. They will be getting tired of moving about so much." "Getting tired?" said John. "Why, bless you, sir, they are quite used to it now. Every time they see a furniture van they run into the yard and lay on their backs with their legs in the air waiting to have them tied."

Senator Lodge had been pointing out some flaws in some of the league of nations articles to a staunch supporter of the covenant when the latter interrupted, saying: "But that isn't what it means. As you express it, I can see the menace, but the meaning as intended is perfectly all right and a good thing for the nation." "Very well," said Lodge, "but in that case, as in all others, an agreement should be worded in such a way that it can mean but one thing and be understood by all to mean just that one thing. Too many of our treaties and our laws are so phrased that sometimes they can be construed in exactly the opposite way from what the author intended. Indeed, many remind me of the announcement of a Boston clergyman who, just before he began his sermon, said: 'There are some flowers here for those who are sick at the close of this sermon.'"

In a confidential little talk to a group of medical students an eminent physician took up the extremely important matter of correct diagnosis of the maximum fee. "The best rewards," he said, "come, of course, to the established specialist. I charge $25 a call at the residence, $10 for an office consultation, and $5 for a telephone consultation." There was an appreciative and envious silence, and then a voice from the back of the theatre, slightly thickened, spoke: "Doc," it asked, "how much do you charge a fellow for passing you on the street?"

A well-known clergyman is in the habit of repeating his sentences several times over to enable the congregation thoroughly to grasp their meaning. On one occasion, while preaching in a very poor district, he came to the following words: "Who was John the Baptist?" He brought them out slowly and distinctly, and then repeated them. After glancing around the church, he once more repeated the words, "Who was John the Baptist?" To his surprise a very seedy-looking individual at the back of the church shuffled to his feet and remarked with a smile, "Look here, guv'nor, I know there's a catch somewhere; but come on, who was he?"

Governor Allen of Kansas was talking in Atlantic City about a ferocious attack which an editor had made on politics and politicians. "Sour grapes," he said. "The man wanted to run for Congress and his party turned him down. His talk now reminds me of the chap who proposed to Lotta Golde, the old-maid heiress. Lotta, the proposal over, shook her head and said: 'No, Mr. Ostrander; a thousand times no. It isn't merely that I do not love you; the truth is that you are even repulsive to me. I am surprised that you risked this declaration. Could you not read your rejection in my face?' The well-known sour grape look gleamed in young Ostrander's eyes as he gave a harsh laugh and retorted: 'No. I was never any good at reading between the lines.'"

The Law of Adjustment.

Said the Man with the Hoe to the Man with the Pick:
"I may be a most unintelligent hick.
But, frankly, I envy the money you've made,
For the less that you labor, the more you are paid.
I'd like to know how you accomplish the trick,"
Said the Man with the Hoe to the Man with the Pick.

Said the Man with the Pick to the Man with the Hoe:
"The way of the toiler is tedious and slow.
Just close up your farm till the middleman begs—He'll soon pay two dollars a dozen for eggs."
For prices go up when production gets low,"
Said the Man with the Pick to the Man with the Hoe.

So the Man with the Hoe said, "I'm through with fatigue,"
And proceeded to join the Non-Partisan League;
And the obdurate middleman yielded at length—
For it seems that in union there sometimes is strength.

And the Man with the Pick, on the following day,
Saw his grocery bill—and then struck for more pay.

A Village of Chess Players.

In a plain of the Harz Mountains, a few miles from the town of Halberstadt, Germany, lies the village of Stroebeck. The history of Stroebeck and its people has for hundreds of years been associated with the game of chess. It is a veritable chess village, a nursery garden for that ancient game.

It appears that from earliest childhood the boys and girls are made familiar with board and men. At school chess is treated as an obligatory subject, and is taught systematically. As soon as pupils have mastered the moves and the rules of the game they are encouraged to undertake the solution of chess problems and to invent new ones, just as another schoolboy is set to making Latin verse.

At Easter there are chess examinations and tournaments among the school children. Three awards of honor in the shape of chess-boards bearing the inscription, "The Reward of Industry," are given by the village community. These tournaments are attended by lovers of chess from far and near. During the last half-century several chess congresses of wide interest have also been held at Stroebeck.

From a very early time the Stroebeckers have had the privilege of challenging to a game of chess any great personage who happens to pass through their village. In the year 1651 the "Great Elector" of Brandenburg was challenged in this way, and in memory of the event presented to the villagers a carved board and a set of silver chessmen, still preserved.

THE MOTION PICTURE INDUSTRY.

San Francisco is now in line to have its share of the motion-picture industry. Nowadays practically all the work is done indoors by means of artificial light. Therefore, as the virtually rainless climate and the intense sunlight of Los Angeles no longer count, the motion-picture men are turning their attention this way.

Already the H. H. Van Loan Studio is going up in San Mateo, and in the course of the coming year there will probably be a dozen more under way in the outlying districts.

This means an enormously augmented circulation of money in San Francisco. These motion-picture people spend as fast as they earn. In Los Angeles Roscoe Arbuckle hired an automobile firm to construct a special car for him that cost $25,000, and few of the big movie people are satisfied with one or even two cars.

They are great dressers and set the pace in Los Angeles, where they are much copied.

And now these royal spenders are coming our way. That means much to the business world of San Francisco. In one month a famous movie star bought $1800 worth of shoes at a Los Angeles shoe house. The jewel merchants, the hotel men, the café proprietors, the taxi men, those engaged in the automobile industry, will after a few years be counting greatly increased profits. Enormous amounts of lumber will be demanded for the studios, of stationery to run the business. There are thirty houses in Los Angeles renting out "props" to the studios. These are merely a few stray items, but there is scarcely any business that will not profit by the addition to the business life of this community of people that make five and six hundred per cent. interest.

The Smallest of Screws.

The smallest screws in the world—those turned out in a watch factory—are cut from steel wire by a machine, but as the chips fall from the knife it looks as if the operator were simply cutting up the wire to amuse himself. No screws can be seen, and yet a screw is made every third operation.

The fourth jewel-wheel screw is next to invisible, and to the naked eye it resembles dust. With a glass, however, it is seen to be a small screw, with 260 threads to an inch, and with a very fine glass the threads may be seen clearly.

These tiny screws are four one-thousandths of an inch in diameter, and the heads are double in size. It is estimated that an ordinary thimble would hold 100,000 of them. About 1,000,000 are made in a month, but no attempt is ever made to count them.

In determining the number 100 of them are placed on a very delicate balance and the number of the whole amount is calculated from the weight of this. All the small parts of the watch are counted in this way, probably fifty out of the 120.

The screws are then hardened and put in frames, about 100 to the frame, heads up. This is done very rapidly, but entirely by the sense of touch instead of by sight, so that a blind man could do it as well as the owner of the sharpest eye. The heads are then polished in an automatic machine, 10,000 at a time.

Quality Concerts.

Frank W. Healy is out with an announcement that will meet with the approbation of music lovers, Mr. Healy offering what is termed a series of "quality concerts" by five eminent artists at the Scottish Rite Auditorium, with season tickets for all concerts selling at $4, $6, and $8. For this small sum one may hear Charles Hackett, leading tenor of the Metropolitan; Raoul Vidas, remarkable young Roumanian-French violinist; Louis Graveure, king of concert baritones; Leo Ornstein, the sensationally successful pianist and composer, and Mme. Frances Alda, leading soprano at the Metropolitan. In addition to these great artists Mr. Healy's concerts will also make known the talents of three excellent pianists, for Seneca Pierce, a very talented composer-pianist, will be "at the piano" for the double concert of Hackett and Vidas at the Scottish Rite Auditorium on Sunday afternoon, December 5th. The combining of Hackett and Vidas was brought about by the fact that Mr. Healy, being too busily engaged with the Scotti Grand Opera Company to attend to concert bookings, found Hackett and Vidas booked in such close proximity as to make it necessary to either cancel one of the artists or to give a joint recital. This latter he has done, for which Mr. Healy should be given the thanks of the music lovers of this community.

Second on the list of great artists is the booking of Louis Graveure for Tuesday night, January 18th. Mr. Graveure has invited Georgette La Motte, the child pianist, of Pawhuska, Oklahoma, who has Indian blood in her veins, to play a group of piano solos. Graveure also brings with him Mr. Eduard Gendron, who has created quite a stir already this season by the great work he is doing "at the piano" for Graveure.

A booking just made brings Leo Ornstein to San Francisco Tuesday night, March 1st. Last season Ornstein created a great sensation when he appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Frances Alda, who after her coming appearance, will not be here in San Francisco for several years at least, has been booked for Sunday afternoon, April 3d, for a song recital. It is expected that Seneca Pierce "at the piano" for Hackett and Vidas will return for the Alda recitals.

An idea of the great treat in store for San Francisco music lovers at Mr. Healy's "quality concerts" is proved by a glance at the programme to be given at the Hackett and Vidas joint recital.

Where Candles Are Used.

A minute news item to the effect that a firm of soap manufacturers had purchased more than 100 acres of land in the southwest of England for the establishment of a candle factory to employ about 5000 hands suggested a forgotten and little-known industry.

It appeared, on further investigation, that the British candle supremacy was being endangered by Continental competition, and the new move is an effort to insist that Britain rule the wicks.

Not having used a candle for so long that one doesn't remember what it looks like, it comes, therefore, with profound astonishment to learn that Britain, in 1919, exported no less than 26,400,000 pounds of candles, of a total value of $6,000,000 or about 25 cents a pound.

Where, you ask, is there any use for 26,400,000 pounds of candles? Well, France took great quantities, in fact France took British candles except when Belgium or Holland slipped in and grabbed an order away from the British soap people. Great cargoes came across the water to North America, and over other seas to Africa. The candle business is quite a thing.

What impresses the authorities most is that during November and December of last year the monthly exports were 5,000,000, or at the rate of 60,000,000 pounds a year, a monthly value of more than $1,000,000. Now the candlemakers have visions of a 1920 production of 240,000,000 pounds. No home, say the candle manufacturers, shall be without a candle.

Britain has held this industry for a half-century. In 1905 her export was 40,000,000 pounds, a total never since reached, although, as stated, it is expected to surpass it five or six times this year. But in those days candles only brought 8 cents a pound, and the total value of the exports was only $3,000,000. Even the candle has gone up.

A father, mother, and son of Washington, D. C., were equipped with clothing at a cost of $2.65 by the United States government. The clothing was of paper imported from Austria, and is rain proof and washable. A pair of overalls cost 15 cents.

"Booze."

It will be well to refrain from comment, and perhaps even from opinion, on the current disclosures as to the alleged deal between certain liquor sellers and the managers of the local Democratic party. Suffice it to say that a restaurant was raided and that the proprietor defended himself in the usual way. He said that a special immunity had been guaranteed to him, that he was even requested to sell liquor as usual, but on the understanding that 10 per cent. of his gross sales should be paid into the Democratic election fund. The names involved are known all over the state, and they include the name, although indirectly, of a United States senator. Of course there are the usual blanket denials, but there is no denial of the notorious fact that liquors were sold at the restaurant in question with hardly less concealment than before the coming of prohibition. Any effort to prove the ignorance of the authorities is a waste of words. Immunity was certainly guaranteed, and it was guaranteed by those in a position to carry out their promises. That goes without saying.

We shall know more about this dirty business in due time unless it is submerged by something still dirtier, which seems likely enough. But in the meantime we should like to know for how long the word "booze" is to make its daily appearance in two-inch headlines in our morning and evening newspapers, and for how long we are to have an exclusive newspaper diet of the mean crimes of mean men against a mean law. Must we henceforth breathe an atmosphere of alcohol, henceforth be confronted with alcoholic reminders at every street corner? Are we to be allowed to think of nothing else? Are our courts of law, from the Supreme Court down, to devote themselves henceforth and exclusively to the interpretation of "booze" legislation and to the discovery that it is actually lawful for us to do what large numbers of persons have been thrown into prison for doing? We are now told by the Supreme Court that the citizen may remove lawfully acquired liquor from one place to another and that this releases ten million gallons of liquor. From an adjacent paragraph we learn that submarine chasers are now being employed in the service of prohibition. In still another column we read of the discovery of a still resulting from the wanton murder of a man by an irate husband. And yet liquor was being sold openly in one of the chief restaurants of the city, the proprietor asserting that it was sold with the full knowledge of the authorities, by their request, and for the benefit of the Democratic party. Was there ever such a mess?

A Chance for the Democrats.

The Democratic party expected defeat, but it did not expect defeat on so large a scale. It could not have been wholly blind to the handwriting on the wall that has become increasingly legible to the rest of the nation, and indeed of the world, and since Wilsonism became a distinctive factor in its councils. Doubtless there were hopes of the unforeseen. There are always incalculable factors in every election. Prohibition was still something of a dark horse. The vote of the women was supposed to be a mystery. The league of nations might show unexpected strength. No one knew what there might be in the chapter of accidents. But thoughtful Democrats everywhere knew that they had run their race and lost it, that the stars were against them. They expected to lose, but they did not expect to lose so heavily, and so perhaps it is not unnatural that their disappointment should show itself in bewilderment and recrimination. A scapegoat, perhaps a whole flock of scapegoats, must be found somewhere. The supposedly guilty ones must be read out of the party. Resentment and revenge seem for the moment to have taken the place that should be given to reconstruction.

Let us hope that better councils will speedily prevail. The Democratic party is not annihilated, nor exterminated, nor any of the other things that are so glibly spoken of it. It remains as much a part of our system of government as ever it was and its disappearance would be a national misfortune. Majority parties flourish, not alone on their own capacities, but upon the strength and the intelligence of the opposition that they must encounter. They find their chief incentive and stimulation in the constant challenge, the critical vigilance, of their opponents. Neither the Republican nor any other party has reason to wish for undisputed power. It would certainly mean schism and disunion. It might easily mean license and corrosion.

It may, indeed, be contended that the Democratic party has now an opportunity of which it may make the most salutary use. It may display by its intelligence a strength that is denied to it by its numbers. It represents, or it did represent, a habit of political thought, a definite political theory, that we may hope will not prevail, but that none the less ought to be presented as a critical and modifying force. The Republicans have now to run the gauntlet of their own successes, an ordeal that it would be foolish to underestimate. The judicial attention of the nation will be focused upon them and upon their critics. The magnitude of their success will bring its own temptations with it. They will be assailed, in a sense, by their own powers, and they will be handicapped by inherited difficulties, domestic and foreign, of the most formidable kind, and sometimes of a nature that does not find its way into the light. If the Democratic party can now ascend to the plane of constructive criticism, of definite and intelligent opposition based on true Democratic principles, it will not fail of the appreciative attention of the nation, due to the proper performance of an essential political duty. There was never a more interested audience than now. Never was there a time when true Democratic statesmanship had a better opportunity to show the stuff of which it is made. The size of the Democratic congressional vote need be no indication nor gauge of Democratic success.

But the Democratic party must learn to diagnose its own malady. There should be no more talk of scapegoats, no more vain searchings for causes that have no more to do with Democratic failure than has the equinox, no more fulminations against individuals who actually did no worse than swim in the eddies thinking them to be the stream. The Democratic party failed at the election, not because it was Democratic, but because it was not Democratic but Wilsonian, so far at least as it was anything. If it had actually been Democratic its failure probably would have been far less marked. It would do well now to recognize that in adopting Wilsonism it abandoned every distinctive Democratic principle and turned its back upon the faith of half a century. It preached popular liberties—and abolished them. It preached economy—and indulged in a saturnalia of extravagance. It broke every one of its own Ten Commandments and violated every clause of its creed. All this it did under the beguilements of a leader who led it into the wilderness of apostasy and left it there. If the Democratic party will now rehabilitate itself, and it can so easily do so, it must renounce Wilsonism and return to the faith. It ought to be eager to do so, seeing that Wilsonism is the negation of Democracy, its denial and its betrayal. There is no other salvation.

Ireland and Her "Freedom."

The letter from Mr. William S. Coghlan on the subject of Mayor MacSwiney deserves something more than the publicity that has been given to it in another column. It deserves a recognition of its sincerity and a glance at its facts. At the same time Mr. Coghlan should avoid those imputations of motives into which he allows himself to wander. The Argonaut is not anxious to "make a good case for England." On the contrary it has repeatedly condemned England for its misgovernment of Ireland, and in severe terms. Mr. Coghlan should know this.

The Argonaut was strictly accurate in its citation of the count on which Mayor MacSwiney was found guilty, and Mr. Coghlan is inaccurate. The mayor was found guilty of "having the cipher under his control." A highly laudatory editorial in the New York Times says: "Of the justice of his imprisonment there seems no question; the secret code of the Royal Constabulary was found in his possession, and with it the manuscript of a speech already delivered which contained seditious utterances. His prison sentence was far from severe."

It is obviously impossible here to enter into a general discussion of the Irish problem. Many hundreds of volumes have not solved it, and its confusion grows worse confounded day by day. None the less a word may be said as to the allegiance owed by Ireland, an allegiance that Mr. Coghlan says was not owing and that ought not to be exacted.

Ireland has been continuously represented, indeed much over-represented, in the Parliament at Westminster. It has often happened that the Irish members have had in their hands the fate of British governments. Every Irish member has taken the usual oath. Every Irish member has been elected by Irish constituencies with the full knowledge and understanding that he would take that oath, an oath in which the stituencies may be said to have shared. Irish leaders have said again and again that they would be satisfied with a measure of Home Rule. To say that these facts constitute no right to "exact allegiance" is to misuse words. It is a part of British misgovernment that Ireland was not satisfied by Home Rule when she might have been satisfied. But certainly it can not now be maintained that Ireland has never assented to her inclusion in the British Empire, seeing that for a hundred years she has actually participated in the government of that empire, and that a constant stream of distinguished Irishmen have sat in the cabinet and in Parliament, have been in command of British armies, have controlled British colonies, and have honorably filled every post and position that has been open to Englishmen, Scotchmen, or Welshmen.

When Mr. Coghlan speaks of "oppression" and "enslavement" he must know that he is using those words in a sentimental rather than in a political sense. He must know that Ireland—at least until the present outbreak—was not oppressed nor enslaved, that she had exactly the same liberties as Wales and Scotland, and indeed greater liberties, seeing that Wales and Scotland have an established and an alien church, whereas Ireland has no such church. He must know that wherever the government of Ireland differs from that of Wales or Scotland it is in favor of Ireland. He must know that the individual Irishman was as free as he is himself. At the same time the Argonaut has a full appreciation of the force and value of sentiment. An outraged sentiment is as galling as a handcuff, but when we speak of oppression and enslavement we usually intend the implication of something personal and physical, and there was no such oppression or enslavement in Ireland. Welshmen, Scotchmen, and Englishmen were drafted into the army, but they made no complaints of oppression or enslavement. Irishmen were not drafted.

Mr. Coghlan seems to suppose that all Irish troubles would disappear if Ireland were granted her independence. What about the Ulster minority that would certainly rebel and fight? If a denial of independence means that the majority will fight, as they are now doing, the granting of independence means that the minority will fight. And when it was proposed to separate the majority from the minority, the majority threatened to fight to retain, and therefore tax, the minority. When Mr. Coghlan speaks of Ireland he means a part of Ireland. He is quite as ready to deny "freedom" to Ulster as Ulster is to deny it to him.

These things are not said in a contentious spirit, but only in recognition of a situation that seems to be ringed around with threats of civil war, and that is not to be settled by phrases or axioms. Nor can we determine whether Ireland would be friendly or unfriendly in the event of her independence, nor whether so small a nation could sustain or defend herself if she became, from the British standpoint, a foreign nation. None the less we may have, and we do have, a strong belief that if Ireland had been independent at the time of the outbreak of the war Germany would at this moment be in a fair way to the mastery of the human race.

What About Mexico?

The Mexican problem is not quite so pressing as it was, but it is none the less a part of the heritage of blunder and chaos bequeathed to the Republican administration. Obregon seems likely to make a good president, as Mexican presidents go, which is not saying very much, but the Obregon government has not yet been recognized by the United States. President Wilson recently sent some sort of mission to Mexico, presumably to make a bargain with a view to recognition, but it is supposed to have failed, as it naturally would fail, seeing that he chose his emissaries from among the crowd of nonentities with which he has always loved to surround himself. Recognition of Mexico can hardly now come from the retiring administration. Recognition would mean the appointment of an ambassador, and a Republican Senate would almost certainly refuse to confirm such a nomination. The situation in Mexico is likely to remain in statu quo until the new administration takes office.

And when the new administration does take office it is not likely to accept fair words in payment of old debts. To let bygones be bygones is a good working principle, but it can not be applied until restitution has been made and amendment guaranteed. All the anti-American laws instituted by Carranza are still in force. Foreigners may not hold real estate outside of a city, and therefore they can not acquire oil rights or mineral rights unless they become Mexican citizens or evade the law by a subterfuge. The old plan of Augua Prieto with all its injustices is still in force, and while we hear a good deal about Mexican good-will there is a strange lack of confirmatory deeds. Obregon, when he was in El Paso, said that Mexico was quite ready to forget the past, and while this was very good of him it carries with it no obligation upon us to do the same. It is not easy to forget the hundreds of Americans who have been murdered, tortured, and dispossessed, nor is it desirable to forget them. Great Britain has just exacted a substantial compensation from Mexico for the murder of Mr. Benton, and if we have seemed to acquiesce in the outrages upon Americans it would be well for Mexico to realize that a change has come over the spirit of our dream and that her immunity has been due to Wilsonism, and not to Americanism. These outrages must now be paid for, and when they have been paid for, when the Mexican government brings forth fruits meet for repentance, it will be time enough for us to follow Obregon's example and "forget the past." Until then we shall remember the past.

There is no reason why we should not live in amity with Mexico. Indeed we heartily wish to do so, although it is too soon yet to be very sanguine about it. But there will be no amity on the basis of the abject surrender of human rights to which Wilsonism has accustomed us. And if Mexico will grasp this fundamental fact and realize that it has retroactive application it will help matters along quite a little.

The Problem of Appropriations.

Federal officials are following the now universal practice and are clamoring for more pay. Heads of departments complain to Congress that they will be deserted by their best men, and particularly by their scientists, unless the emoluments are made more attractive. Secretary Meredith of the Department of Agriculture is particularly persistent in his demands and he is sustained by the Federal Employees' Union, numbering about a hundred thousand persons scattered throughout the country. Now there ought to be, and there is, no disposition to underpay the servants of the Federal government, but at the same time the matter ought to be regulated, not according to the insistence of some particular department, nor under pressure from some particular quarter, but with an eye to the general needs of the situation as a whole.

Secretary Meredith, for example, happens to be a specially good "persister." He knows the game and he is familiar with all the ways and weaknesses of Congress. Moreover, he has been clever enough to secure the support of the American Bankers' Association, who are impressing upon Congress the importance of the Department of Agriculture and the necessity of liberal appropriations in its aid. Now Congress is sensitive to pressure and to loud noises, and apt to yield to them without much regard to the abstract justice of the situation. On the other hand, the Department of Commerce, which is just as important as the Department of Agriculture and which probably employs just as many scientists, does not happen to know the ropes and has no one at its head who understands the art of advertising. As a result the Department of Agriculture is likely to get all that it wants while the Department of Commerce is left out in the cold. It may be said that the Department of Commerce contains the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, the Bureau of Standards which is doing research and technical work of great value, the Bureau of the Census, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the entire lighthouse establishment, the Bureau of Fisheries, and the steamboat inspection service. The appropriations for the Department of Commerce have increased 39 per cent. from 1913 to 1919 inclusive, while the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture have increased more than 80 per cent during the same period.

Now it is understood that unless there is an increase in taxation there will be no more money available this year in the public treasury than there was last year. If there is an increase in any one department there must be a corresponding decrease in some other. It must therefore be decided if the Department of Agriculture is more worthy than any other department. Should its appropriations be increased at the cost of any other department? Are its accomplishments so much more worthy of support that discrimination of this kind should be made in its favor? It is much to be doubted.

The whole thing points to the urgent need for some sort of a budget system. The size of appropriations ought not to be determined by a Congress always sensitive to pressure and at the request of associations of merchants or bankers who can not possibly have any knowledge of the situation as a whole. The intrusion of lobbies working on the congressional mind does not conduce to an equitable apportionment of the public funds on a basis of public values.

The committees of Congress entrusted with the distribution of funds are in a far better position to know the relative needs of the various departments than any outside association that happens to be interested in some particular branch of work and that perhaps raises it to a place of importance that it does not deserve.

The national bookkeeping is of course in a chaotic state and will so continue until some adequate budget system has been devised and put into operation. It would be too much to say that this is the most important question of the day. Certainly it is not. None the less it should find a place on the Republican programme, if only to lessen the chance of another carnival of extravagance such as the one that we have just passed through.

Editorial Notes.

The settlement of the British coal strike removes a danger that was certainly national and that might easily have been international through the cessation of exports. The men are to receive an additional 50 cents a day and they on their part promise to sustain the volume of production. The vote to continue the strike was actually larger than the vote to return to work, but the situation was saved by the two-thirds rule. The danger, therefore, is by no means over, nor will it be over until basic human rights receive a warmer recognition in England than has been the case heretofore. Industries that must be kept alive by the social degradation of a million men must either be reorganized or they must disappear.

President Wilson in his recent clash with Senator Spencer on the promise to send troops to Europe said: "I am perfectly content to leave it to the voters of Missouri to determine which of us is telling the truth." Thereupon the voters of Missouri reelected Senator Spencer. Never was the "appeal under Cæsar" more decisive.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

National Sovereignty.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 2, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: John P. Irish in a letter to the Argonaut on the Japanese question says: "By three ways may sovereignty extend over territory—by discovery, conquest, and purchase."

Sovereignty means "supreme power." Supreme power is a myth; it does not exist, can not exist. The matter has been settled by the last war, which knocked smithereens the claim of the German Kaiser to supreme power by divine right.

There is no such thing as divine right. The power to legislate is the only power vested in a government by the acts of the governed, and this power is limited by justice and by individual inalienable rights. A limited power is not a sovereignty. Sovereignty is absolute and supreme power. It is an idea antagonistic to human interests. The word has no longer any practical application. National sovereignty is an impossibility. All that may be claimed by a nation is legal jurisdiction over its territory. This is not sovereignty.

For these reasons it may be said that "legal jurisdiction over territory may be acquired by discovery, conquest, and purchase." Although from the point of view of justice neither discovery nor conquest nor purchase is a sufficient reason to establish a legal jurisdiction. These may lead to conditions excusing the assumption of jurisdiction for the welfare of these territories, but this jurisdiction should be confirmed and accepted by the governed before a justifiable claim to this jurisdiction is obtained.

The act of annexing territory by discovery, conquest, or purchase does not deprive the inhabitants thereof of their natural or inalienable rights nor of the right of demanding equality and justice. There is no such a thing as the "right" of discovery, of conquest, or of purchase of territory. There is no "right of confiscation." Confiscation is an act of barbarism which originated in the plundering hordes of barbarians who overwhelmed ancient civilization. It is not a "right," but the application of "force."

Whether right or wrong from the point of view of justice, it has been the custom of the victorious by force of arms in war to exact an indemnity from the vanquished or to impose a penalty on the conquered.

The alleged right of conquest following the right of discovery of America by Columbus, the conquest of Mexico by Cortes, and the annexation of territory to Spain by Pizarro and others are only the results of acts of force, and not strictly justifiable.

The "real right," which all historians have failed to mention, was the right of individuals to seek happiness and welfare anywhere they chose on the surface of the earth and the right to settle and reside in the place of their choice. This right is the only justification for the occupation of America by the Europeans.

If the Europeans had contented themselves with the liberty to occupy undeveloped land instead of unmercifully crowding out and destroying the natives the historical shame, now the remorse of the whites, would not have to be recorded.

The crimes of the white races in America have been followed by similar crimes in Africa. The partition of the African continent by the European nations promises to be a repetition of the events in America.

However, the past is the past; a series of accomplished facts which it is now useless to discuss. It behooves at present to endeavor to act in the future in a way more creditable to civilization and in view of the general interests of mankind considered as an entity.

Divine rights, national sovereignty, religious fanaticisms, and all such excuses for policies of self-interest are today without standing. There exist today accepted principles concerning the relations of human beings among themselves which can not be ignored with justice. This world is not a white man's world; not exclusively.

When the descendants of the English, the Irish, the Germans, the French, the Italians, and other Europeans claim that California is a "white man's land" this slogan is a criminal denial of human equality. This world exists for the benefit of all mankind on equal terms! No portion thereof is the inheritance of any one race, nationality, or community. America is no more the white man's land than Africa the black man's or Asia the yellow man's land. There is no valid reason for the whites to assume civilization's burdens and on that account to claim special privileges and refuse equality to others. Nor can the other races claim the right of exclusion of the whites from their territories. Europe for Europeans. America for Americans, Asia for Asiatics, and Africa for Africans is all nonsense. The truth is that the earth exists for all on equal terms.

However, "national jurisdictions" must exist until all mankind is ready to accept a global jurisdiction. Certain customs, traditions, and climatic conditions make local legislation a necessity. There is, however, no valid objection to the limitation of local legislation by mundial principles acceptable by all and which should be upheld by an international court of justice.

The natural tendency of the human race is to leave the overpopulated sections and to settle in regions undeveloped, and nothing may be done with justice to hinder this tendency. As gold flows to the places where it is most in demand, so population flows to the places which offer the best opportunities for betterment of individual conditions. If this tendency is unobstructed by prejudices and unwise legislation, by force and persecution, the result would be a proper distribution of population on the globe, a benefit to humanity.

Up to the present time the process of distribution of population over the surface of the world has been greatly influenced by the foreign policies of the greater white nations—England, Germany, France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and the United States. The selfish interests of each of these nations have asserted themselves in different ways.

Speaking specially of the nations whose interests are backed by military and naval force, those nations who spend stupendous sums in armaments to maintain their prestige and commercial interests, speaking of the policies of those nations which attempt to stifle free competition for the sake of the prosperity of their inflated industries, it is proper to remark that the day is not far away when all artificial policies with greed as an objective will be swept away, never to come back, by more humane and logical policies with freedom, justice, and equality as a foundation. Woe to the nations who fail to see the signs of the times! Woe to those who persist in upholding race and religious prejudices! Woe to those who obstruct liberty!

It is almost incredible that the last war has been fought only to shift the supremacy of military and naval powers from some nations to others. It is not possible that this result will be permanent.

Concentrated in certain portions of the world an immense population is seeking elbow room and better opportunities for happiness. These people are bound to break loose from the tyranny of those who are exploiting them. Let the United States take notice. Today they are prosperous, nay extremely wealthy. Our people should lay aside race prejudices. The blacks in our midst have an equal amount of rights as others. Stop lynching. Let us play fair with these human beings. Let us give the example to the world of a policy of justice, tolerance, and humanity. Let us show the ambitious Japanese, now bent on conquest, that might must yield to right. Let us show the world that we can legislate intelligently and with justice, without encroaching on human rights, without curtailing liberty. Then may we be proud of our country and profess our patriotism without remorse for our past failings. Let us stand upon our merits without protection, without using artificial methods to foster our so far insatiable greed for wealth. Let us place character and honor above riches and vanity. Let us emulate the world by our achievements in art, science, invention, and industry in open competition. We must become great on account of the moral merit and intelligence of our people. By all means we must get rid of the political corruption which, if allowed to subsist, will lead us to decadence.

We are in the position, if we so wish, to lead the world in the new era of justice and liberty.

Our Declaration of Independence is the most important document of Americanism. It is important on account of the declaration of the equality of men, of their inalienable rights and the statement that government derives its power from the consent of the governed. The declaration of our grievances against the acts of England have no longer any importance. These are things of the past, but the principles are eternal. These principles are the only protection of the minorities against the abuse of power by majorities.

We have failed to observe these principles. Our judiciary, from the Supreme Court of the United States down to the police courts, has allowed these principles to be violated. The Supreme Court interprets the Constitution of the United States. This document no longer means what is expressed in the language of the text. And when it is said that the Supreme Court has interpreted the Constitution it would be nearer the truth to state that in many cases it has misinterpreted its meaning.

It is time to sit up and take notice of the lack of conscience evidenced by these acts. All our officials are supposed to be guided by the principles of the Declaration of Independence. They are sworn in to obey the Constitution and the treaties as the supreme law of the land. Still these men, who should show the highest character, are influenced by the political fear of the vote and by their selfish interests.

Herein lies the great peril to our institutions. If we continue to disregard the principles of Americanism we are destined to lose the place we have so far occupied in the world as an example of government by justice, right, and liberty. Our government is a representative government; all its activities are based on elective majorities; but these majorities have no right to tyrannize minorities. The rights of all individuals are guarded by the restrictions upon legislation placed by the moral obligation, and there is none greater, of our representatives to observe the principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence and the observance of the Constitution. Not even in times of war may these principles be ignored. All our present troubles have come from the fact that these were not observed by Congress and the Administration.

No such waste and extravagance, no such curtailing of individual liberty, no such abuses of power as we have experienced during the war could have occurred had our legislators been loyal to the principles of the Declaration of Independence and to the Constitution of the United States.

No government may go back on fundamental principles with impunity. It is because our officials and legislators have ignored these principles that we have our present political problems, including the Eighteenth Amendment and the controversy about the league of nations. It is time to return to these principles. It shall be the duty of all citizens to see that this is done. It was the usurpation of power by the Administration and Congress which has demoralized our political system. It shall be a difficult task to repeal all the obnoxious laws and administrative regulations which have been saddled upon our people. We all should demand that this be done quickly and thoroughly, notwithstanding the power back of the selfish interests involved, be they capitalistic or laboristic.

Let us hope that soon we may again boast of our loyalty to Americanism and freedom. Let us hope that enlightened individuality shall prevail, that it will establish a social morality, the religion of human solidarity, instead of the now existing theocratic morality and authority fetishism!

Yours respectfully, LEMICE TERRIEUX, JR.

Mayor MacSwiney.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 3, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In your issue of October 30th, commenting on the death of Mayor MacSwiney, it seems to a constant reader of your valuable paper that in this instance you have gone far beyond the bounds of truth and fairness in your comments.

Perhaps, as you suggest, MacSwiney is not a martyr; he was at least a patriot and died rather than surrender his ideals of right and liberty. We honor Washington and Jefferson and a host of others of revolutionary fame that they, too, risked their all for just such ideals. Of what was MacSwiney "guilty" of, as you use the term, that Washington was not guilty of? Is success to be the standard by which a man becomes a patriot and defeat the standard by which the same man becomes a traitor? You do MacSwiney wrong when you say he was "sentenced to prison just like thousands of other prisoners are sentenced all over the world." Is there no distinction in your mind between the acts of a criminal and those of a man who risks his life and liberty in the cause of freedom? The comparison made of Debs and MacSwiney is grossly unfair to the latter and odious to say the least, for Debs is a citizen of the very country against which he conspired and by which he is imprisoned, while MacSwiney was jailed and persecuted by a country to which he owed no allegiance and which had no moral right to exact allegiance from him. In your enthusiasm to make a good case for England you fall into error when you say that MacSwiney was found guilty of having a secret government cypher. In his trial, which was perhaps as fair as could be expected under the circumstances, he was acquitted on that very count.

Why is it unthinkable that England should grant independence to Ireland? Would she not in fact be giving back what never rightfully belonged to her? Do you still cling to the doctrine of Bismarck that might makes right; that the sword is the one supreme arbitrator? Only by force and a never-ending system of repression has England kept her strangle hold on Ireland. Her policy, stubborn and stupid to an unbelievable degree, has ever been one of destruction and extermination, and yet she boasts of democracy and labels herself the champion of small peoples. The saddest spectacle of the twentieth century is seen in the enslavement of Ireland, the only white nation held in bondage by a people whose only superiority lies in their greater force of arms and resources.

To put the secession of the South in 1861 and the revolution in Ireland as parallel examples is either an instance of wilful misrepresentation of facts, or of a profound ignorance of what the secession of 1861 really was. Just such an argument is being put forward by the British press and statesmen, and particularly by Lloyd George, to give a semblance of justification for their oppression of Ireland and the Irish people. Not that they believe it themselves, but they offer it as a sop to the conscience of their people and the peoples of other nations, trusting to the general ignorance in Europe of American history to pass it off for the truth. The secession of 1861 was the breaking away from and the attempted dissolution of a Union which had been ratified by the several states voluntarily and without coercion. It was an act against the very Constitution each state had sworn to uphold as the reward of statehood. Can that be said of Ireland, which of itself was a nation, and which though conquered physically by superior force has had the courage, through centuries of oppression and suffering, to deny her conqueror the right to claim her as part of the British Empire?

The argument put forward that "England can not endure the existence of an independent and hostile nation almost within sight of her coast" is ridiculous when the one and only remedy for that hostility is in the hands of England herself. That hostility is not without its cause, and each succeeding day of British occupation but adds to that cause. Only by granting complete independence to the Irish people can that cause be removed and the foundation laid for a better understanding between the two countries. If, after a thousand years, England can not subjugate the Irish people and bring them into harmony with the rest of the British Isles, is there any reason for supposing that she ever can? Much has been written about the quality of British courage and sportsmanship, but has she enough of either and of statesmanship to frankly admit her failure, and to try, late as it is, a new experiment? Would not the voluntary granting of independence go a long way to soften that ingrained hostility, and pave the way for the establishment of friendly relations between the two nations which would be a safeguard for both instead of the menace that exists today? To say that Ireland can not govern herself is to flout history and to slander the great men of Irish birth who have shown their ability in war and in peace in Ireland, in England, and elsewhere. Those "fierce internal fires" you speak of would no doubt subside, once external pressure were removed and the people, given a chance to look at matters through unprejudiced eyes, had found the common meeting ground which makes for harmony.

Surely no one disputes your contention that the dissolution of the British Empire would be a world calamity in these trying days of readjustment and widespread unrest. But the independence of Ireland need not mean dissolution. England lost her greatest colony and has survived, even prospered, and has seen that "lost" colony, grown to a nation richer and more powerful than herself, stands by her side on the battlefields of France when the very fate of the empire hung in the balance. Can it be said that the child of the revolution, grown to manhood, remembered the wrongs of its infancy and cherished a secret grudge against its ancient parent?

Ireland's case is one in point. She seeks no territory but her own to govern. She asks no favors, but demands the right to lead her own political and social life as she sees fit to do so. She asks an Irish rule for Ireland, even as we sought and won an American rule for America. Are we, as Americans, enjoying the fruits of that victory of 1776, won in the blood and suffering of our forefathers, to sneer and scoff that she aspires to those same heights? Are we so stupefied and sunk in our own complacency and self-satisfaction that the trials and suffering of those seekers after freedom leave us unmoved and even irritated and annoyed that they should aim so high? For some this may be so, but to those to whom Washington still stands as the apostle of liberty, to those who honor Lafayette and thrill with pride at the courage of a Nathan Hale, the death of MacSwiney is not, as you suggest, the death of a criminal, but the sublime sacrifice of a martyr on the altar of freedom.

Yours very truly,
WILLIAM S. COGHLAN.

WOMEN AT THE POLLS.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton once wrote an essay to warn us against the fallacies into which we are likely to be led by our habits of generalization. It is so easy to assert this, that, or the other about large bodies of the community, and because the vision is thereby diffused we give our assent readily to propositions that we should at once reject if they were applied to the individual rather than to the mass. Thus, says Mr. Chesterton in effect—I forget his exact words—we are all of us ready vaguely to agree if some one says to us, "the women of the nation are toilsomely ascending the path that leads to the good, the beautiful, and the true," or "the women of the world have fixed their aspiring gaze upon the radiant star of their destiny." No one thinks of contradicting a thing of that sort, even to himself. It seems in some nebulous sort of way to be true. At least it ought to be true, which is nearly the same thing. A vision of Susan B. Anthony and others of that ilk flashes across the mind. We remember often to have heard that same sort of thing said, which of course is strong evidence of its truth. It has become a sort of axiom, and who would dispute an axiom? But suppose some one were to say to us that Mrs. Brown—who lives next door and who is therefore under observation—is "toilsomely ascending the path that leads to the good, the beautiful, and the true," or that Mrs. Jones, who lives opposite and who is thus equally under observation, has "fixed her aspiring gaze upon the radiant star of her destiny." At once we begin to laugh. They are admirable and excellent women, both of them. But they are not toilsomely ascending anything more poetic than the back stairs, nor have they fixed their aspiring gaze upon anything much less material than little Johnny's nose and its imminent requirements. Assuming Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Jones to be representative women, and they are, we see at once how ludicrous was the original assertion, although we were ready to give it our adhesion when presented to us as a generalization. And we make just the same sort of assertions about men, and should laugh at them just as much if we applied them to particulars instead of to universals.

It was this habit of generalizations that led us into such uncertainties during the recent election. We wondered how the women would vote. In other words we thought of them as women, and not as human beings. Deep in the hearts of a good many of us was a sort of haunting dread that the vote of the women might upset all our calculations, that it might even go solidly to the Democrats under some emotional conviction that the cause of peace was bound up with the Democratic fortunes. We said that the women's vote was an "unknown quantity," and we talked about "new electoral factors," very much as we might have talked if the roulette wheel or dice had been suddenly introduced as electoral determinants. But if we had turned our attention to a few individual and unselected women and ascertained their methods and intentions we should have found that the women were acting in pretty much the same way as the men, although much more intelligently and much more ethically. We should find that a certain number of women were being guided entirely by their husbands, which of course is very foolish, just as a certain number of men were being guided by their selfish and personal interests, which is very much worse than foolish. But beyond these few we should find that women were studying the questions of the day much more diligently than men, that some among them came to one decision and some to another—almost like human beings—and that there was no such thing as a women's vote considered as an entity, that actually no new factor had been introduced, only an extension of an old factor.

Never was there such a chimera as the idea that women would run blind-eyed after any hysteria if only it bore the label of universal peace. There again we see the evils of the generalization. How often have we heard it said that "women are pacifists"? Of course we assented. We usually do assent to propositions that are conspicuously untrue. The assertion seemed in some way to chime in with our conventional conceptions of the feminine character. The woman was supposed to sing, with a catch in her breath, "I did not raise my boy to be a soldier," although it was a man who wrote that song, and, moreover, a man who had sent all his available family into the army. Now if we had only looked around among the women we knew we should have seen in a moment that they were not pacifists, and then we should have avoided a very radical mistake. We might then have realized that even though women were to become dominant in the government of the world there would still be wars, perhaps just as many wars as there are now. For women most decidedly not pacifists. They may express in a somewhat more emotional way than men the universal desire for peace, but so far as pacifism goes in the colloquial sense of that word women are not more addicted to it than men. Ask Mrs. Brown next door or Mrs. Jones across the street. Veritable daughters of thunder during the war, both of them.

When Miss Jane Addams went to Europe to stop the war by an appropriate display of baby ribbon or by singing hymns, or whatever it was, she failed lamentably. When she came home she told us all about it. She was reported as saying that she might have done something with the men. At least they would listen. But the women!!! The female of the species in Europe was so much more deadly than the male. And it was pretty much the same here. The women threw themselves into war work, not only because much of it was humanitarian work, but because at heart they were combatants. The average woman knew far more about the war than the average man. She knew more about even the strategy of the war. It was she who pored over the war maps and attended lectures and read everything that was readable. The man was usually content to spout a little patriotism and let it go at that. He had a contempt for the "highbrow" who wanted to know who the Jugo Slavs were and the origin of the Magyars and the terms of the treaty between Greece and Serbia. But the women knew all about these things. There was no discernible pacifism about them. Most of them were bitter-enders. If they had voted solidly for Wilsonism it would have been one of the surprises of the day.

When we look forward half humorously to some time when women shall rule the world we are apt to forget that we have already passed through such a time and that nothing particular happened—except wars. A few years ago we find two women governing nearly the whole of the human race. Those two women were the Empress of China and Queen Victoria. But wars did not cease. Quite the contrary. China passed through some of the most troublous periods of her history, and Great Britain was never at peace for a single year during the half-century of Victoria's reign. Indeed it was said that Lord Randolph Churchill resigned from the cabinet on one occasion because the queen wanted war and he was determined that there should be no war. Certainly neither the Empress of China nor Queen Victoria were pacifists nor did the reign of women bring universal peace.

It has been the same story all the way down through history. It is women, and not men, who have been the militarists. One might almost say that every country has reached the height of her military fame under a woman. It was Boadicea, "smarting" neath the Roman rods, who personally led her compatriots to victory. Cleopatra was something of a soldier. So was Catharine of Russia, who partitioned Poland and whose name was a terror throughout the land. Queen Louisa of Prussia defied Napoleon. Queen Elizabeth of England made war on Spain, reviewed her troops at Tilbury, and is said to have personally designed the attack on the Spanish Armada by fireships. And then there is Joan of Arc, who commanded the armies of France in many battles, overrode the strategical opinions of her generals, planned her sieges and attacks, suffered wounds like a common soldier, and at last achieved the aim of her military efforts and crowned the Dauphin at Rheims. Nor need we stay to notice the women's battalion in Russia nor the great deeds of actual fighting that have been done by so many women all the way down through history. Mary Imbree, for example.

Many of the finest war poems were written by women. Indeed the inspirational work of women during the war was beyond all estimation. If women had had their way there would have been no shameful armistice, no marching home of the German armies with drums beating and flags flying to be crowned with laurels in Unter Den Linden and to boast that they had saved Germany from invasion and had morally won the war. And this at a time when another week of fighting would have meant the envelopment of the German armies and their unconditional surrender. It was usually the women who were hot with indignation at the pacifism of a man, at a pacifism that so constantly showed itself in ways favorable to Germany, and it is women who have now contributed largely to the overthrow of an administration guilty of that pacifism.

No doubt we shall continue to talk about the pacifism of women because we have acquired the habit of doing so, because we think collectively instead of individually, because we look at masses instead of persons and consequently see neither the masses nor the persons. But if we were to look at Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Jones and also at their worthy but probably inferior husbands we might correct our ideas, not only about pacifism, but about a good many other things, too. And that would be good for us.

SIDNEY CORYN.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 10, 1920.

Though thousands of small schools failed to open for the fall and winter courses throughout the United States, the newspapers announce the opening of hundreds of new motion-picture playhouses.

The surplus female population of the world has risen from about 5,000,000 to 15,000,000 since the beginning of the world war.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mrs. Woodrow Wilson is sitting for her portrait to Seymour Stone. She poses every day in the big north room just before time for a motor ride with the President.

In 1912 Arthur Thibadeau left Paris, France, to walk around the world for a prize of $100,000 said to have been offered by the Revel Athletic Association. Thibadeau is still walking and had covered 55,164 miles on foot and 35,000 miles on water at last reports. He must go 25,000 miles farther before January 1, 1925, to win.

Since the town of Jewett, Texas, came under the rule of women several months ago much progress has been made in civic improvements, especially in the matter of cleaner alleys and streets. Mrs. J. A. Adkinson, the new mayor, is also municipal police judge, but so orderly and law-abiding have been the people of the town since the woman came into office that she has not been called upon once to hold court. This is regarded as a remarkable record for a town of 1000 population.

Mrs. Mary Austin, novelist, has been asked to sit to David Edstrom, the sculptor, who is celebrating the success of the suffrage amendment with a piece of work entitled "Woman as Prophet." Mrs. Austin is the author of several interesting books of travel about our Southwest, such as "The Land of Little Rain," "California, the Land of the Sun," and "The Flock," a book about sheep-raising in the San Joaquin Valley. She has also written many fine novels and books embodying the lore and customs of the Indians of the Southwest.

Rudyard Kipling is the latest of the English authors to undertake writing for the screen. Paul Brunet, head of the Pathé organization, announces that he has entered into an arrangement with Mr. Kipling by which he will adapt some of his published stories to the motion-picture medium, and, it is indicated, write one or more original scenarios. Assisting him in casting his stories in the technical language and form of the studio will be Randolph Lewis, a scenarist and continuity writer, who will soon go to England for the purpose.

Lately arrived in this country, where he comes to talk on art to students of the leading art schools, is Leonce Benedite. With him came his daughter, Mlle. Rosa Benedite. They spent but a few days in New York, then left for San Francisco, whence his tour of the country will begin. M. Benedite is the director of the National Museum of Luxembourg in Paris, where modern paintings are shown in distinction to the Museum of the Louvre, which conserves old art. He is a lecturer and writer of great distinction on art subjects, and has published many works. Leonce Benedite was born at Nimes, where he received his education. He is a chevalier of the Legion of Honor and president of several societies of painters and engravers, including the Society of Parisian Painters.

Friends of Miss Helen Ackerman are urging recognition, in the form of a Carnegie medal, of the heroic services by which she saved many lives when northern New York was stricken last winter with an epidemic of influenza. Miss Ackerman, a slender girl of twenty-one, is the district schoolteacher at Oak Point, a hamlet six miles from the nearest railroad. Her school was closed when influenza broke out and she was told she could take a vacation. Instead of taking the opportunity to enjoy a holiday, however, she plunged into the work which proved her a heroine. Hearing that every family in the near-by town of Hammond had been stricken by influenza, Miss Ackerman hastened there to aid the sufferers. Going from house to house, she nursed them unaided and beyond doubt was the means of saving many from death.

Arthur William Heintzelman, a young etcher who has suddenly sprung into fame, was born in 1892 at Newark, New Jersey. He began studying art when he was nine years old and won a scholarship that enabled him to travel and study abroad. Before he was eighteen he became head of the fine arts department of the Detroit School of Design. His career up to the present time has been a continuous progress in the direction of official honors. Museums have given space for exhibitions of his etchings and bought examples for their permanent collections. He has been elected to all the prominent societies of etchers and awarded prizes. Critics have praised him. There is no denying that so prompt a popularity is dangerous, but his deep and strong interest in his work for its own sake may be trusted to save him.

Harold Bell Wright, popular novelist, is said to have endured a life of toil and privation. He had contended with not only poverty, but ill-health. Born in 1872 at Rome, New York, he had been one of four boys, only two of whom survived. Left motherless at the age of ten, this boy, shy but proud, was early sent forth to do battle with the world. He had some talent as a painter and it was toward an artistic career that his first ambition was directed. Lacking the means to study under a master, he was forced to turn his ability to such humble channels as decorating and house-painting. While in the little quarry town of Grafton, Ohio, he had been converted to the doctrines of Christianity and his imagination fired by the possibilities of reformation in that field, he resolved to abandon painting and become a minister. With this end in view he—at the age of twenty—entered the preparatory department of Hiram College. He had no means whatever and was forced to labor after hours to subsist.

On July 1st last Marion LeRoy Burton, having retired the day before from the presidency of the University of Minnesota, became president of the University of Michigan—traditionally acclaimed as the Harvard, Yale, and Princeton of public education in America. He succeeded Harry B. Hutchins, who retired at the age of seventy-three after twenty-five years of continuous service at the Ann Arbor institution, the last ten as its head. Dr. Burton was born in Brooklyn, Iowa. While still an infant the family moved to Minneapolis. There, when not in school, Marion sold newspapers and later clerked in a drug store. Leaving Minneapolis after a year in high school, he worked his way through the preparatory academy of Carleton College, Northfield, Minnesota, and then through the college course. He taught a year in the college, was for three years principal of a small town academy, went to Yale University and garnered the doctor's degree in philosophy, taught theology in the Yale divinity school for a year, spent one year in a Brooklyn pulpit—New York, not Iowa—and then accepted the presidency of Smith College at Northampton, Massachusetts. After seven years at Smith, he went back to Minneapolis, heralded as "the returned newsboy," to be president of the University of Minnesota.

OLD FAVORITES.

To W. A.

Or ever the knightly years were gone
With the old world to the grave,
I was a King in Babylon
And you were a Christian Slave.

I saw, I took, I cast you by,
I bent and broke your pride.
You loved me well, or I heard them lie,
But your longing was denied.
Surely I knew that by and by
You cursed your gods and died.

And a myriad suns have set and shone
Since then upon the grave
Decreed by the King in Babylon
To her that had been his Slave.

The pride I trampled is now my scathe,
For it tramples me again.
The old resentment lasts like death,
For you love, yet you refrain.
I break my heart on your hard unfaith,
And I break my heart in vain.

Yet not for an hour do I wish undone
The deed beyond the grave.
When I was a King in Babylon
And you were a Virgin Slave.

—William Ernest Henley.

The Old Oaken Bucket.

How dear to this heart are the scenes of my childhood,
When fond recollections presents them to view!
The orchard, the meadow, the deep-tangled wild-wood,
And every loved spot which my infancy knew;
The wide-spreading pond and the mill which stood by it,
The bridge, and the rock where the cataract fell;
The cot of my father, the dairy-house nigh it,
And e'en the rude bucket which hung in the well.
The old oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket which hung in the well.

That moss-covered vessel I hail as a treasure,
For often at noon when returned from the field,
I found it the source of an exquisite pleasure,
The purest and sweetest that nature can yield.
How ardent I seized it, with bands that were glowing!
And quick to the white-pebbled bottom it fell:
Tben soon with the emblem of truth overflowing,
And dripping with coolness, it rose from the well;
The old oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket, arose from the well.

How sweet from the green mossy brim to receive it,
As, poised on the curb, it inclined to my lips!
Not a full blushing goblet could tempt me to leave it Though filled with the nectar that Jupiter sips.
And, now, far removed from the loved situation,
The tear of regret will intrusively swell,
As fancy reverts to my father's plantation,
And sighs for the bucket which hangs in the well;
The old oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket which hangs in the well.

—Samuel Woodworth.

Marshal Murat was the dandy among Napoleon's generals. One Paris tailor said that in some years he had made as much as 100,000 francs' worth of suits, overcoats, and uniforms for Murat. He liked to invent new and fantastic uniforms, he strutted about in a suit of sky-blue overalls covered all over with gold spangles and he decorated his bushy with aigrettes. On the occasion of his triumphant entry into Warsaw, when he supposed he would be made King of Poland, he wore an impossible-looking uniform, red leather boots, tunic of cloth of gold, sword belt blazing with diamonds, and a great bushy of fur decked out with costly plumes. On this occasion Napoleon lost his temper and testily exclaimed to his general: "Go and put on your proper uniform; you look like a clown." But the emperor was not misled by Murat's love of finery, for it is recorded that he once said of him, "You may smile at my dandified marshal, but you will notice that when columns are shot down today, Murat's gaudy plume will be dancing in the hottest of the fight. Let a hero have one folly, gentlemen."

AN ENGLISH WIFE IN BERLIN.

The Princess Blücher Describes Events and Experiences in Germany During the War.

Evelyn, Princess Blücher, the writer of these memoirs, is an Englishwoman who was married in 1907 to Prince (then Count) Blücher, great-great-grandson of the famous Marshal Blücher of Waterloo fame. Count and Countess Blücher were well known in English society and lived in England until the coming of the war, when the count's nationality forced them to go to Germany and join the colony of "internationals" who made their home at the Esplanade Hotel in Berlin. Here they lived in a state of freedom, met every one of note, and were able to observe the course of events. Princess Blücher undertook the care of British prisoners and wounded, in which she was assisted by two other ladies in a similar position, Princess Pless and Princess Münster. The moderate tone of her memoirs, the obvious desire to be accurate and fair, mark them as a highly important contribution to the story of the war.

The princess begins her memoirs with her departure from London. There were 250 Germans at the station, and the Austrian ambassadors and many of the embassy members came to see them off:

The ambassador and amhassadress (Prince and Princess Lichnowsky) arrived at the last minute and got straight into the train, the amhassadress quite heart-broken, and making no attempt to hide her grief. The train steamed out of the station amidst a hushed silence, people on the platform weeping, and the men with hats off standing solemnly silent. It was as if a dead monarch was being borne away.

The ship that conveyed the party to the Hook of Holland was fired upon in consequence of a misunderstanding, but with this exception everything went well on the journey to Berlin:

We had many interesting conversations during the journey. The sadness and bitterness of all these Germans leaving England struck me intensely. Here we are, they say, being dragged away from the country that has been our home for years, to fight against our best friends. They all blamed the officials in Berlin, who had, they said, grossly mismanaged the negotiations. It had been an obsession in some of the German officials' minds for years past that Russia meant to attack them. "Well, then," said some one of the party, "why not wait until they do it? Why commit suicide to avoid being killed?"

"What chance have we," said some one else, "attacked practically on every side?"

"Is no one friendly to Germany?" asked another.

"Siam is friendly, I am told," was the bitter reply.

The author began her diary at once, and thenceforth we have nearly daily entries describing her experiences and her impressions of the progress of the war so far as authentic news was allowed to reach her. Thus on September 1, 1914, she writes:

To my horror, another English defeat has been reported at St. Quentin. I hear they have been driven back at Maubeuge and Mons, and I can hardly think of it without tears. I have made out a list of my relations and friends, and sent them to the doctors in the frontier towns, asking them to let me know if their names are on the lists. I mean to find out some way of getting news, in spite of all regulations to the contrary. The German papers all say the English fought splendidly, but are wanting in training and discipline, and . . . I hold my tongue at this criticism and only say that England has often begun a campaign with reverses, but in the end she is indomitable.

On October 18, 1914, the author speaks of conversations with German soldiers who had returned from the front, one of whom told her that there was no real hate among the combatants and that at the Belgian hospital where he was English, French, Belgians, and Germans sat and smoked together in amity. But there were other and less pleasant pictures:

One hears of such fearful horrors from those returning. One young German wounded officer, who had been spending his convalescence here, said that his regiment had been practically annihilated by their own side, through a mistake of his colonel's. It was in Belgium, and they had arranged to scour a wood in silence, two different regiments from different sides, during the night. The colonel, forgetting the arrangement that it was to be done in silence, suddenly shouted a word of command, and this was understood to be the signal to fire on the enemy. And then one regiment simply mowed down the other in the pitch dark, and the noise was so fearful that no one could hear the shouting to "cease fire" until it was too late. One regiment practically ceased to exist, except for this young officer and about forty men. He was in such a state of collapse from the horrors of the recollection that he was nearly out of his mind.

The news of the sinking of the Lusitania was hailed in Berlin as a just punishment on America for her breaches of neutrality. Naturally there was a change of attitude among the Americans in Berlin, most of whom had tried to preserve at least an outward semblance of impartiality:

The Americans here in the hotel, and those of the embassy staff, had always professed to be neutral. They had been cordial and friendly towards the Germans they met, had gone out together, had played tennis, and so forth. But a sudden change now took place. The Americans openly avoided the Germans, almost cutting their friends of the day before. Friendly intercourse was absolutely out of the question. Their rage and horror at the idea that Americans had been killed knew no bounds, and they gave vent to their views in unguarded terms. One German turned to me and said, "You and other English ladies here have self-control, but these American ladies, once they are roused, do not care how or where they express their feelings."

The shortage of copper became the topic of the day toward the end of 1915. Cartloads of old copper utensils were to be seen on the streets, and as the government paid well it was considered by many as a good opportunity to rid themselves of their old copper:

Then we talked of the terrors of submarine warfare. One officer present described how his submarine had been caught in one of the English net traps. There he and the crew had to remain for hours under water, like rats in a trap; no possibility of escape, and a death of starvation. They eventually managed to break through, but many don't. He said they could live for seven hours below the sea before dying of suffocation, and shuddered, poor man, even then as he spoke, at his recollections.

The princess speaks in hot indignation of the execution of Edith Cavell. She does not believe that she could have been a spy in a city like Brussels. Even in Berlin if one sneezed out of tune one was accused of signaling to the enemy. Perhaps she had helped wounded soldiers, but then what woman would not do so?

And then, why was it done in such a hurry? And why were all the others forgiven, and only she executed? Was it, as it is hinted here, due to private and personal malice because she was English? All those who were forgiven were of another nationality. Well, it is a blot; in fact, another blot, to be quite exact; and as a German officer said sadly to me today, when the war is over, and in the years to come, however distant, these blots are the things that will be remembered and go down to history, and all the brave deeds and wonderful feats that our troops and armies in the field have done, and all the many individual acts of heroism will be forgotten, and only such episodes as these will stand out.

The princess has much to say about Sir Roger Casement. She met him many times, conversed with him, and was well informed as to his plans and also as to the attitude adopted toward him by the German government. In some respects, and particularly as to the attitude of the German government, she makes a distinct and valuable contribution to our knowledge. In October, 1915, she writes:

I have got some more news about Roger Casement. He came here today from Munich for a week, and I saw him for a moment. People here have very mixed opinions about him. Some think he is an English spy and only pretending to be a rebel, whereas others laugh at him as at a man who has failed.

He tried, as usual, to talk me round about Ireland. I told him Ireland to me was like a little terrier hitting at the heels of two great mastiffs. "Why," I said, "if he loved Ireland so, had he come to Germany?" He wanted to stop the recruiting, was his reply. But that, I told him, could have been done more effectively by having remained in Ireland or having gone to America. "Why stop it?" I asked him. "The Irish had proved such splendid soldiers and had even won an entire battle by themselves."

Then his pride in the Irish soldier showed itself, proving that in reality he does not know what he wants. But when he begins airing his opinions in too self-satisfied a manner, it makes me want to repeat to him the words I had heard lately from the lips of a German lady about him. "If you ask me," she said, "what I think of Roger Casement, I think him a blot on the earth!"

Missing a few pages for the sake of continuing the references to Sir Roger Casement, we find the author describing an interview that she had with the unfortunate man on April 4, 1916. Sir Roger Casement rung up on the telephone to say that he must see her at once, and although she was by no means anxious for the interview she consented to receive him:

The poor man came into the room like one demented, talked in a husky whisper, rushed round examining all the doors, and then said: "I have something to say to you, are you sure no one is listening?"

For one moment I was frightened. I felt I was in the presence of a madman, and worked my way round to sit near the telephone so as to be able to call for help. And then he began: "You were right a year ago when you told me that I had put my head into a noose in coming here. I have tried not to own you were right, and I did not like to tell you when you kept on urging me to get out of the country, that I realized from the moment I landed here what a terrific mistake I had made. And also I did not want to tell you that in reality I was a prisoner here. I could not get away. They will not let me out of the country."

"The German Foreign Office have had me shadowed, believing I was a spy in the pay of England, and England has had men spying on me all the time as well."

"Now the German Admiralty have asked me to go on an errand which all my being revolts against, and I am going mad at the thought of it, for it will make me appear a traitor to the Irish cause."

And at these words he sat down and sobbed like a child. I saw the man was beside himself with terror and grief, and so I tried to get a few more definite facts out of him, and told him there is a way out of every difficulty if he would only tell me more.

But he said, "If I told you more, it would endanger the lives of many, and as it is, it is only my life that has to be sacrificed." I made all sorts of suggestions, but all he would say was: "They are holding a pistol to my head here if I refuse, and they have a hangman's rope ready for me in England; and so the only thing for me to do is to go out and kill myself."

A few weeks later the author heard of Sir Roger Casement's arrest on the west coast of Ireland and of his being taken to the Tower by two policemen. Then she tells us that the whole thing was a scheme of the German government to rid themselves of a man whom they suspected to be a spy and whom they knew to be a useless nuisance:

Very little of the affair leaks through the censorship here. On the whole no one will say a good word for him. The Germans, who are not partial to traitors, even if they use them as tools, scoff at him as the impotent leader of a lost cause, and the Americans and other neutrals despise him, whilst the few English hate him.

It is certain that the Germans in their own minds looked upon him as an English spy, and it was only when he happened to fall foul of a certain naval officer that they concocted their scheme of handing him back to England for England to do her dirty work herself. But between the time he was "handed back" and the time of his arrival in Germany, that is the time when I had the opportunity of seeing the man drink the cup of humiliation to the dregs, penitence and starving, friendless and hunted, should I have been a woman if I had not given him a meal at times, or on the last day, when he was going to a certain death, and came to me abject with terror and evidently out of his mind, could I have done less than promise to use what influence I had to ask for mercy for him? With this object I have written to a friend in England, but have little real expectation that it will save him from his fate.

The Germans confidently believed that the Zeppelins would bring their enemies to terms, and they were greatly enraged when they learned that the raids upon London had produced, not only anger, but also a new sort of humor:

At the same time there is a lighter side to the raids. In fashionable shops you can see nightdresses and dressing-gowns advertised as "Zepp nighties," "Robes for Raids," etc.

This to the German mind appears the zenith of superficiality, frivolity, and English arrogance (arrogance in their belief that nothing can touch them). They are much too ignorant of the English character to realize that an Englishman (or woman) might feel a pang of fear, but with his last breath he would say, "I don't care."

The English could not have chosen a more effective way of showing the enemy the uselessness of these raids than by jeering at them.

The author shows a kindly if somewhat contemptuous feeling for the emperor. Writing under date of December, 1915, she says she wish people knew that he had forbidden the air raids over London—which we find it a little hard to believe—and that he had tried to oppose the submarine warfare. Under the same date we are told of the growing feeling of rebellion in Berlin:

A lady I know was telling me of her experiences in a "Stadtbahn" railway carriage the other day. There was a poor Galician peasant girl who couldn't speak a word of German, and who had been told to go to her home and to leave Hamburg. She had a piece of paper in her hand with her name and address, and was weeping bitterly all the time.

This naturally started the people in the compartment talking, and as it was a third-class carriage, comments were pretty free.

One man said out aloud: "We can't talk now, hut wait till our turn comes; we're not going to sacrifice all our blood for the rich. They'll be surprised at what we shall have to say when our turn comes!"

When is that turn of theirs to come, I wonder?

Another entry, and under the same date, tells us of the growing hatred of Americans that was then showing itself in Berlin:

But to return to the question of hatred, which has today assumed such biblical dimensions that it can only find expression in the words of the Psalmist. "If England he well hated here, America is hated still better," as the Bavarians would say.

Their hatred is in fact so intense that many Germans will not be seen speaking to an American. They assert that if it had not been for America continually supplying the Allies with munitions and money, they would have been financially ruined by now, and the war over long ago. One gentleman the other day likened America to a great greedy vulture, feeding on the carrion of the battlefields of Europe, and growing ever grosser and more complacent as the masses of its gory food increased.

The book of Princess Blücher contains so many interesting and important sidelights on the war that its concluding pages may well be reserved for survey in our next issue.

AN ENGLISH WIFE IN BERLIN. By Evelyn, Princess Blücher. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $6.

Not less interest is being taken in the electrical instruments for the use of dentists and surgeons, and in this connection it is permissible to refer to the worldwide curiosity which is felt relative to the claim made by Dr. Eugen Steinach of the University of Vienna that he can restore youth to the aged by the X-ray. The full merits of this treatment are yet to be determined, as is the efficacy of the patent taken out by young Edward M. Hubbard of Seattle for a process of generating electricity from the air by means of a dynamo weighing only forty pounds. Hubbard says his invention will revolutionize the uses of electricity in the home, office, etc., for by it every householder shall be able to make his own heat for cooking and house heating and shall be dependent on nothing but air for his supplies. In Italy a similar discovery has been announced. Gustave Leutner, a widely-known engineer, has discovered, he says, a system by which static electricity in the atmosphere may be transformed into dynamic current. The apparatus is described as antennae bearing a retroactive collector joined to a special transformer which is acted on by the radioactive matter through a chemical process which the inventor does not explain. But his experiments have been successful, it is reported, and a larger apparatus is being constructed.

"Captain Pete" Pappers is one of the men who piloted Mississippi River steamboats in the days of Mark Twain. He was first mate of the Natches at the time of its famous race with the Robert E. Lee. He ran the blockade of the river for the Confederacy during the war.

France is being swept by a strange series of "mature marriages of famed ones," the two most recent additions to the ranks being Anatole France, the novelist, aged seventy-six, and Camille Flammarion, astronomer, aged seventy-eight years.

Mme. Kerensky, whose husband once was premier of Russia, was compelled to sell cigarettes on the streets of Petrograd to obtain food before making her escape to France.

The estate of former Empress Eugénie, who died recently, is valued at more than $10,000,000. She had many jewels of curious design, considered almost priceless.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

The The San Francisco Clearing House Association reported clearings for the five-day week ended Saturday at $150,400,000, compared with $164,500,000 for the six-day week ended November 8, 1919. Saturday's clearings were $25,000,000.

A gain in gold reserves amounting to $3,793,000 during the week ended November 5th was reported by the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco in its comparative statement of condition made public Saturday.

Total gold reserves for the week are reported at $167,339,000, of which amount $65,635,000 is held by banks within the district, as against $56,477,000 last week. Total reserves are reported at $167,730,000, as compared cases. It will be effected, however, without serious general results by reason of the inherent strength of the credit situation and the assured coöperation of the banks with business.

The banks are amply prepared to finance business while it is working out a more normal basis of operation and a stable level of prices. This process will require the employment of a large volume of credit. Inventories can not be disposed of abruptly. In many lines, owing to general indisposition to buy, their liquidation must be effected very gradually. Meanwhile, they must be financed. The long run effect of the downward price movement, however, will be to ease the credit situation. The freedom from disturbance with which the readjustment is effected depends largely on the willingness of business to recognize the changed conditions.

Stabilization on a new price basis does not involve a return to the pre-war price level. For nearly two decades prior to the war, prices have been rising steadily. On economic grounds this rise might reasonably have been expected to continue, had there been no war. Moreover, the improvement effected in our credit and banking machinery since the inauguration of the Federal Reserve system now enables a gold reserve to finance a greater volume of business at higher prices than was practicable in the pre-war days. The country's present gold reserve greatly exceeds the pre-war reserves, and this enlarged and concentrated gold reserve will have a sustaining influence on the new price level. The actual level at which prices will be stabilized can only be worked out gradually on the basis of actual transactions over an extended period.

A group of securities which has stood out prominently in the markets of the last month or so is the public utilities group, many stocks of which are making new high records for the year from week to week. There was not such a scramble to get into these stocks as there had been in railroad stocks, and consequently the technical position in this group has not been weakened in the same way. Meanwhile every argument in favor of the railroads would apply to public utilities, and the principal one is still to come for the public utilities and probably a good deal in advance of its working out in the rails. This is in reference to the declining tendency in wages. The labor situation is undergoing a radical change for the better. Instead of labor continuing to demand more and more pay for fewer and fewer hours of work, just the reverse of this situation is now obtaining. In fact, unemployment promises to bring serious problems before long. The Philadelphia Company and the United Railways Investment Company stocks have been especially well in the market recently and should continue to do better, as the Philadelphia Company earnings are increasing by leaps and bounds and its dividend must be radically advanced sooner or later, while the United Railways Investment Company is not only in control of the bulk of Philadelphia Company stock, but it has its own street railway situation in San Francisco working out to better advantage.

There has been a preëlection plunge in some of our local traction stocks. Manhattan Elevated seems particularly worth while and, if proper rate increases are permitted, other tractions should do a good deal better. Certainly much must be said in favor of stocks like Columbia Gas, Consolidated Gas, People's Gas, and most similar public utilities. There has been an important buying movement in several Standard Oil stocks, and Standard Oil of New Jersey in this connection seems especially attractive now that the expansion policy of the company is developing increased earnings.—The Trader.

One independent steel company, it is reported, has been offering steel bars at the United States Steel Corporation's schedule prices. This does not mean necessarily that all the independent steel makers will come to the Steel Corporation's schedules, but it certainly shows the drift in that direction, and unless orders pick up a good deal in the trade it will be anything but surprising to find independent interests cutting sharply under the Steel Corporation. Indeed this happened only a year or so ago, but now that the world is struggling to get back to a normal basis increased importance is attached to the efforts of foreign steel makers to expand their trade interests. The results in the end will certainly be a readjustment in wages such as will permit a radical downward revision in steel prices.

Copper is seeking lower levels and other metals are still very heavy, and with general business conditions as they are it looks as if they would decline considerably farther. Copper metal may not reach its real turn this time until it gets around 13 cents.

There has been a pronounced upswing in the cotton market, mainly due to the covering of a considerable short interest. The underlying situation in the trade has not changed a particle, and there seems to be no reason that a recovery will hold.

The main influence operating against cotton at this time is found in the continued refusal of the general public to buy more than they have to. The cotton planters and agricultural interests generally are doing exactly this thing themselves, in order to hold their products for the higher prices which they hope to secure, so that they can not object if others of the public resort to the same economical policies.

The grains have been holding pretty well of late, but it is to be doubted if any material recovery, at least of a sustained character, is in prospect. Canadian wheat continues to operate in sharp competition with our own, and the holding policy of the farmers certainly can not be very successful when the public is insisting upon lower living costs. As a matter of actual supply and demand corn is very high at present prices.

There has been a considerable expansion of bond market activity during the current period, with good investment buying and a continuation of the general upward trend of prices which began about the middle of August. There has been at the same time a marked expansion in the volume of new financing successfully floated (says the National Bank of Commerce in its November Commerce Monthly). Of particular importance is the fact that a considerable portion of the new issues represented the funding by industrial concerns of floating bank indebtedness into fixed capital. This constitutes a real strengthening of the general credit situation.

In addition to the large domestic issues several foreign offerings have likewise been successfully placed during the period; including a $20,000,000 issue of 8 per cent. twenty-year bonds of the Kingdom of Norway and $10,000,000 of bonds of Solvey et Cie, a Belgian trading association having interests in certain American chemical companies.

On October 15th the $500,000,000 Anglo-French Loan, for the redemption of which preparations have long been under way, matured and was paid off. The governments interested, and particularly Great Britain, had already acquired a substantial portion of the issue through market purchases, leaving, nevertheless, a substantial amount of funds which will now be released for reinvestment.

After careful study, Moody's Investor's Service comes to the conclusion that the bond market, which has slumped since the war, is strong, and probably will go stronger, "underlying factors being even more satisfactory than the action of bond prices themselves." It is recalled that after the civil war there was a tremendous slump much like the recent one, and it was not until four years after the end of the conflict that a bull movement really began in bonds, "although bond prices never went any lower than the levels of February, 1866." This authority on securities and investments calls attention to the better present-day organization of our finances, a fact which indicates a much quicker reaction. In fact, it is held "not inconsistent with precedent to look for the beginning of a real boom movement in bonds next year or even suppose that it may have already begun in a small way." The chief conclusions reached are stated as follows:

1. Interest rates in New York City during September averaged about 8 per cent., as compared with 8-13 per cent. for August; and this is the first decline in our monthly averages of interest rates which has occurred since August and September, 1919. Indeed it is the first significant decline which has occurred at all since the money market first tightened up in June, 1919; for the relaxation in August and September a year ago was plainly and assuredly temporary. As money becomes cheaper bonds, of course, should grow stronger.

2. Commodity prices are falling, and the decline has recently amounted almost to a slump. Basic raw and crude materials, which exercise a dominating influence upon finished goods and products, have already gone off enough to make it quite certain that the whole mass of goods and products will sell substantially lower early next year than it is selling now, and a great deal lower than it was selling a few months ago. These prices move, not in mass formation like a single unit, but rather in a long, thin column, one after another; and the decline is bound to continue until each raw or semi-finished material has pulled down its finished products in somewhat like proportion, and until each group of finished products has readjusted its prices in a measure to all the other groups taken as a whole.

3. To bondholders the point is that this fall in commodity and goods prices powerfully tends in two distinct ways to raise bond prices. First, it releases working capital from productive and commercial business to such an extent as to force interest rates downward and make it more profitable to buy bonds than to lend money; and secondly, the lower goods prices go, the more the purchasing power of bond incomes is increased. Otherwise expressed, a decline in good prices serves to increase both the intrinsic value of general business outlook (says the National Bank of Commerce in New York in a review of the credit situation). The movement is a natural and inevitable corrective of the unstable condition created in the previous period of rising prices, reckless public buying, and widespread speculation. Falling prices are not a recent development. Before the close of 1919 the prices of a number of important commodities had begun to decline. By spring of 1920 a definite downward trend had been established. Since then the movement has been accelerated, until within recent weeks it has forced general recognition that the period of excessive buying at rising prices has definitely ended. Business must now go forward on a lower price level. This readjustment can not be effected without embarrassment in individual

May, and issues of new industrial bonds were only $22,125,000, against $64,059,200 in May. There has been a like decline in issues of notes. This decrease in the supply of new securities tends to enhance the prices of the old; and the decrease itself promises to continue because the time has now come when the stock market regards a new bond or note issue as a bear point on the stock of the given company.

5. Then, too, the wasteful flow of capital into new speculative enterprises of doubtful stability is rapidly diminishing and a portion of the capital thus saved is bound to find its way into the bond market. New incorporations in August were only $941,300, 000, against $2,280,500,000 in January. This decrease also promises to go forward, because the price inflation that induced the rapid multiplication of new concerns is now diminishing.

6. Commercial failures are running about four times as heavy as they were in January, and this, strangely enough, is bound to help the bond market, not only through making safe investments relatively more attractive than they were in comparison with risky trade enterprises, but also by stimulating thrift and curtailing extravagance. Heavy failures always induce such caution among business men that they feel like garnering in their receivables and investing the funds with a view to safety of principal.

7. This drift of public sentiment away from speculative investments and enterprises is hastened by the decline in industrial stocks. Twenty representative industrials fell from 119 3/4 last November to 83 late in September, 1920, and they look less attractive to the public at lower prices than they did at the higher. In the autumn of 1919 the public was so sure that commodity and goods prices would never come down that investors were buying speculative common industrials at the top prices upon the theory that their great war-earning power would prove permanent. Now that this illusion is dispelled, these same investors are willing to pay a premium for safety of principal.

Looking at some of the evidences behind these conclusions, Mr. Moody's statisticians cite some interesting figures showing the trend in interest rates—the average monthly New York interest rates for call and time money, commercial paper, and acceptances taken as a whole; an average of railroad and industrial bond prices; average prices of twenty industrial stocks; and Broadstreet's index number. These figures are given as follows:

President Rupprecht of B. B. & R. Knight, Inc., one of the largest cotton manufacturing organizations in the United States, has just advised E. H. Rollins & Sons that during the past two weeks the sales of his company's famous product, "Fruit of the Loom," have been greater than in the previous seven months. These sales were made to four times as many purchasers as in previous years. This recent rate of selling activity may be taken as one indication of the country's return to normal conditions.

It will be remembered that the 7 per cent. first mortgage bonds and 8 per cent. preferred stock of this company have recently been offered to the public at prices to yield 7.88 per cent. and 8.33 per cent.

In a letter to G. H. Mohr, manager of Watson & Co., Mr. J. A. Partington, motion-picture expert, has the following to say about the motion-picture industry in San Francisco: "With respect to the motion-picture industry coming to San Francisco, I certainly believe the time is psychologically right and have been watching the progress of late along those lines. I predict that within the next year San Francisco and the immediate locale will be engaging at least 40 per cent. of the productions made in California, and believe that San Francisco citizens and merchants will become very much interested as soon as the fulfillment of the promises has been made by the production companies. I see no reason why the Golden State Motion Picture Corporation should not participate in and enjoy the full share of the success that the industry offers to concerns such as theirs with an honest principle and strict commercial lines that I feel sure you will work with."

The offering of 1000 shares of the common stock of the White House (Raphael Weill & Co., Inc.), San Francisco, by Stephens & Co., representing the residue of the recent issue of 12,500 shares remaining unsubscribed by stockholders in France is due to the depreciation of international exchange.

William R. Staats & Co. are offering two new municipal issues. The first is $30,000 5 1/2 per cent. bonds of the Jefferson School District in Los Angeles County, and due 1921 to 1945. The other offering is $10,000 6 per cent. bonds of the Atascadero School District in San Luis Obispo County, maturing 1922 to 1931.

E. H. Rollins & Sons have received another excellent report from the Wickwire Spencer Steel Corporation, covering their business for the nine months ending September 30, 1920. The many stockholders and bondholders of this corporation on the Pacific Coast will be interested to know that, for this period, the company reported net sales of over $26,000,000, while net earnings after taxes were given as about four and three-fourths times first mortgage bond interest. According to the report, 8 per cent. preferred stock dividends were earned about five and a half times.

The Fireman's Fund is making preparations to occupy its new quarters on Sansome Street adjoining the company's head office building.

John Marshall, vice-president, is home from an extended trip through the East, where he represented the company at many important insurance conventions and various automobile conferences.

Assistant Secretary C. C. Wright has been appointed chairman of the executive committee of the Pacific Coast Automobile Underwriters' Conference.

E. H. Rollins & Sons announce that the state superintendent of banks has definitely certified Junior Orpheum San Francisco first closed mortgage 7 per cent. bonds as legal investments for California savings banks.

The Atchison, Topcka and Santa Fe Railway system is receiving thirty new refrigerator cars a day, and delivery by the manufacturers at that rate will be kept up until the middle of January, 1920, when 2500 cars will have been received.

The new equipment will relieve the car shortage to a considerable degree, as the bulkheads and ice bunkers are collapsible, making it possible to increase the loading space from 20 to 25 per cent. when the cars are used for products which do not require refrigeration.

Another improvement in construction of the new refrigerator car is a permanent floor rack six inches high to keep the contents off the floor, and to give better protection in winter and better circulation in summer.

These 2500 refrigerator cars with 500 new Russian Short Stories.

Here we have four little volumes of short stories translated from the Russian. The editor, S. N. Syromiatnikov, tells us that the form of the short story is not popular among Russian writers, whose attention to psychological analysis demands a fuller form of expression. None the less we have here some admirable examples of the art, and also a number of Russian fables which it seems were actually intended to have a political application, the censor being usually too stupid to detect their real meaning. Most of them are surprisingly clever with a mordant wit that could hardly have failed in its effect. Students of Russian literature would do well to avail themselves of this little series illustrative of a tendency that will doubtless find fuller expression in the future.

LITTLE RUSSIAN MASTERPIECES. Edited by S. N. Syromiatnikov. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Little Heroes of France.

The many war activities of Kathleen Burke, now Mrs. Peabody, are so well known that they need not be repeated here. From the time of her first visit to Serbia soon after the beginning of the war, until the signing of the armistice Miss Burke's career was one of unceasing activity, which included not only the practical work of nursing and relief, but also of those appeals to the charity of the world, and particularly of America, that did so much to lessen the miseries of the conflict. But it was France that enlisted the chief of Miss Burke's sympathies, and the present book is one of their results. Miss Burke saw much of the children of France, of their heroisms as well as of their sufferings, and now she gives us twelve stories selected from the much larger number enshrined in her memory. Some of them are almost unbelievable in their pathos and in the magnificent courage that they depict, but none the less they are strictly and literally true. That they are told with all the energy that comes from sympathy need hardly be said.

LITTLE HEROES OF FRANCE. By Kathleen Burke. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co.; $1.75.

Strategy.

Military strategy has not changed very much from the earliest days until now. Leaving out of consideration the nature of the weapons we find the armies and navies of antiquity doing pretty much the same as the armies and navies of today, seeking advantage in the same way, adopting the same ruses and employing the same devices.

This is apparent enough from the substantial volume that comes from the industrious pen of Rear-Admiral Bradley A. Fiske. The author begins his historical illustrations of war with Thutmose III and Ramses II of Egypt and he ends them with the great war. Between these two periods are Miltiades, Themistocles, Philip, Alexander, Caesar, Charlemagne, Marlborough, Frederick, Washington, Nelson, Napoleon, and Molke. We have a rapid summary of their military achievements, and finally we have a section on strategy as related to peace, war, and statesmanship. The book contains various illustrations and plans.

THE ART OF FIGHTING. By Rear-Admiral Bradley A. Fiske. New York: The Century Company.

The Treaties.

Mr. Baruch was economic adviser to the American commission at the peace conference and also he held various other positions of a financial and economic nature. No one could be better informed on the treaty itself nor the methods that led to its construction.

Mr. Baruch believes that the treaty must be revised and that it can be done without calling a new conference, but he has no particular condemnation for those responsible for its faults. He seems to think that they did the best they could under the pressure from democracies that are supposed to epitomize human wisdom, but that seem rather to represent a noisy folly. The Allied nations "had been aroused to a white heat of fear, hatred, and distrust." To have run counter to the public will would have meant the overthrow of at least three of the major governments and the establishment of other governments worse instead of better. Lloyd George had pledged himself to make Germany pay for the war. France was similarly expectant. No one dared to tell the truth, no one was brave enough to challenge the wrath of the little gods. The Americans were afraid to take up a position consonant with the fourteen points lest they should seem to be pro-German. They did what they could and even succeeded to some measurable extent, but they were none the less compelled to accept a treaty that could not be enforced and that no one supposed could be enforced and that must now be modified so far as its elasticity will permit.

Mr. Baruch's book can be read almost at a sitting. Nearly half of it consists of a reprint of the economic sections of the treaty. What remains is moderate, restrained, and reasonable.

THE MAKING OF THE REPARATION AND ECONOMIC SECTIONS OF THE TREATY. By Bernard M. Baruch. New York: Harper & Brothers.

English Divorce.

W. B. Maxwell has a lance to tilt in his latest novel, and a bright and shining one. A determination to hold up the iniquitous brutalities of the English divorce law to public reprobation has been the mainspring of the novel "For Better, For Worse," in which the author shows up the British method of mentally flaying a woman alive in a public court of law before she is allowed to escape from the thralldom of a marriage that has become immoral on account of the character of the husband.

No doubt the rule works both ways, and men who are legally tied to worthless women suffer, although in a less degree from the British determination to turn a man's deepest reticence into a blazing beacon; apparently for the delectation of sensation-seeking idlers allowed at the court sittings.

Mr. Maxwell has created his situation with great particularity. He marries a delicate-minded, shy, reserved, virginal young creature in her teens to a handsome young cad, and the girl's martyrdom begins with the first coarse embrace. He makes his readers suffer in sympathy for the innocent victim, as the rapid deterioration of the unscrupulous adventurer she has married begins. And it is soon made apparent to American readers how much more chivalrous our law is to women than the British law, which makes no allowance for women of conscience, pre-supposing that every woman applicant for divorce is animated by questionable motives.

In working out his case, however, the author, recognizing the necessity of presenting a figure of blameless, submissive, suffering wifehood, has drawn pretty heavily on the element of chance to make the wife seem to have committed the guilty acts charged against her. But he certainly has a case against the ethics of the law when he makes it plain by inference that the wretched victim, discredited, disgraced, and stripped of every rag of good repute to which she is rightly entitled, has scarcely any alternative left but to yield herself to the protection of the wooer who had sought to have the law legitimize their union. Thus, we are given to understand, the law works against itself, more especially as the wife has no separate rights over her own property, since her legal union with the dissolute cad, hound, and virtual criminal remains undissolved.

"For Better, For Worse," is not a cheerful book, but it is a most interesting one. If the fair English militants of 1910-14 are still on deck it will be a wonder if they do not warm up into a war against such a law, for the book would make excellent propaganda against the continued maintenance of a law that is terribly hard on women.

FOR BETTER, FOR WORSE. By W. B. Maxwell. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

Fresh and Fair.

Anne is a delightfully piquant creation, and so is the story that bears her name. "Anne," by Olga Hartley, is an English novel, charmingly written by an author whose eye sees an England full of pictures. Every house, every garden described makes one think of a Shelley poem. The author, indeed, is a poet herself, not because of the one original poem in the book, but because her mind and heart are both full of a pure, fresh, fine conception of life, its problems, its tasks, and its legitimate joys.

To add further charm to the qualities of the author she is possessed of a spontaneous flow of humor, and her dialogue is witty yet natural. Also, her men talk in a mannish way.

The story is well balanced, for Anne, who is a lovable elf with quantities of charm, but no stay to her swift impulsiveness, runs her harque of life on many a reef, and when sorrows come the laughing poet-author sounds the chords of feeling with a delicately sure touch.

In fact Anne the girl—for Anne, in spite of wifehood and motherhood, is the kind that will be forever young—and "Anne" the story balance each other, for both have depth, delicacy, and are instinctively in touch with the delight and the sadness of normal living.

ANNE. By Olga Hartley. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $1.90.

Wings of War.

The entire air forces of the United States were employed against Villa in 1916, and it need hardly be said that they were useless. A year later the country was called on to meet the airplane demands of the great war, as well as all the other demands of that unprecedented struggle.

In this volume the author tells us the story of the making of the airplanes. Beyond a certain amount of delays and of red tape he seems to suppose that our airplane enterprise was in every way a success, as indeed it was if success is to be measured by vast mechanisms and by assurances of what we should have been able to do but for the fact that the war had come to an end before we had done it. Mr. Ryan is quoted with approval as saying that our airplane manufacture "was a great adventure and we are all proud of it," possibly a legitimate thing to say amid the enthusiasms of a public lecture, but one that compares strangely with the Hughes report and that seems to be in ill accord with the disgust felt and expressed by the American fighting force, who were clamoring for airplanes rather than for statistics.

WINGS OF WAR. By Theodore Macfarlane Knapp. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $2.50.

A race of pygmies of such primitive characteristic that they are but little removed from ape men have been discovered in the forests of the Belgian Congo, Africa, by Dr. Leonard J. Vandenbergh, a Catholic missionary and anthropologist, who returned to the United States recently from a tour of central Africa which extended over eleven months. The adults of the newly-discovered tribe average about four feet in height. The creatures are known to other tribes as Mambuti, and are very ape-like in appearance, and the males can move with surprising agility through tree branches.

Work has been begun on the New York-New Jersey vehicular tunnel connecting New York City with the Jersey commuter. It will cost about $29,000,000.

A Book of Adventure.

"The Wanderer," by Henry C. Rowland, is an amusing yarn of the series of adventures that befall a couple of pals who are sailing on a Mediterranean cruise in a schooner of doubtful ownership, which fact heightens the qualities of the adventures. Mr. Rowland is evidently an extensive traveler, familiar with the Levantine and Asiatic ports and the highly colored and rather sinister life-characteristic of those quarters of the globe. He introduces into his story a diversity of types, making the reader acquainted, among other entertaining adventurers, with a rascal who, posing as the wealthy owner of a yacht, runs a floating gambling hell and neatly fleeces a whole group of chance acquaintances. The hook is not a specimen of literature, but entertainingly written, although the author uses the colloquialism "a hit" in every other sentence. He unrolls his tale without any special care, but it has the cheerful, spontaneous tone of a natural raconteur, and as the story has no literary pretension its occasional relapse into a guide-book tone will be accepted good-humoredly by the reader.

THE WANDERER. By Henry C. Rowland. New York: A. S. Barnes; $1.50.

In Unknown China.

An absorbing contribution has just been made to the literature of Chinese exploration by S. Pollard in a volume published by the J. B. Lippincott Company under the title of "In Unknown China." The author is a British missionary with a sense of humor and a highly entertaining faculty of recounting unusual experiences, his religious ardor seemingly not acting as an obstacle to "seeing things as others see them."

The volume in question deals with a penetration by Mr. Pollard into a portion of China which, apparently, is as much closed to the foreigner as is Tibet. To get to the gateway of the country requires strenuous traveling along the Upper Yangste, graphic pictures of whose perils the author gives with lavish abundance. To pass through the pillars and into the land itself requires a combination of influence, good luck, nerve, and capacity for intrigue such as seem to be possible only to one who has had long contact with the Chinese and can fathom both their language and their silence. Mr. Pollard appears to have been able to meet both requirements, i. e., the endurance to make the physical trip and the friends, fortune, and astuteness to get through the postels.

One particularly valuable secret of making headway in China Mr. Pollard offers for his fellow-Occidentals who may wish to see something of the interior of the Great Republic. It consists of the capacity to make the Chinaman laugh. Almost any crisis in one's adventures in China will disappear, says Mr. Pollard, if one can have the wit and knowledge to provoke the natives to laughter. Even plots for murder or assassination can be foiled by this device.

On the whole, the world of travel literature is much enriched by Mr. Pollard's work. The hook is readable in the extreme, and in spite of that is very instructive.

THE MOISEWITSCH CONCERT.

The verdict on the first Moisewitsch concert was such as to justify the management in locating Tuesday night's concert at the Exposition Auditorium, for there were 6500 or 7000 present.

The young pianist had the magnificent support of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, who opened the programme with "Vor-spiel" from "Lohengrin," superbly rendered. Mr. Moisewitsch's first number was the Schumann A Minor Concerto, which he played with marvelous technical skill. The young artist, however, did not set the enthusiasm of his audience fully aflame until, on his native heath as it were, he gave the B Flat Minor Concerto Tschaiakowsky. In this glorious composition the player was absolutely incredible. No one could dream of the strength residing in his slender young body. The movements of his hands and fingers fairly dazzled the eyes by their amazing and almost inhuman swiftness, and one had to close one's eyes to surrender the imagination to the wild, poetic charm of the music.

It seemed as if we had never heard a pianist whose notes were so vari-colored, and always so beautifully pure in tone. Each separate pearl was of the most precious and inconceivably beautiful luster. And when the audience wooed an encore from him the player gave them himself in another mood. Encompassed by the breathless hush of the listening multitude, the player gave "A Song Without Words": an artist's mood played with the most heavenly sweetness, tenderness, and a divinely wistful questioning of the fates.

It was so superbly lovely that "Le Rouet d'Omphale," offered, no doubt, by Hertz and his orchestra as a relief to the emotional splendors preceding it, seemed like an anticlimax. It was beautifully played nevertheless, and I do not doubt that the audience felt a sense of civic pride that such an artist could have an orchestra of such quality to bear him company in the two concertos.

Later Moisewitsch gave the Liszt-Mozart Fantasia on "Don Giovanni," closing with an encore, Weber's "Perpetual Motion," that Hafeitz plays with such dazzling speed and brilliancy.

Wonderful as is the young violinist's feat in playing this piece, Moisewitsch's is more so, on account of those incredibly swift flashings of his steely yet velvet-tipped fingers up and down the long key-board, and the game-like perfection of each of those notes which followed each other with such unbelievable swiftness that we almost rubbed our eyes and demanded, "Is this real?"

"THE CAVE GIRL."

George Middleton and Guy Bolton, authors of "Polly with a Past," wrote "The Cave Girl" for the present American mood of frivolity. It is located in the Maine woods, in which two New York families are summering at Caribou Lodge. The seniors of the family have manoeuvred their young people to this isolated spot in order to make a match between them.

Fate, however, decrees otherwise. The Cave Girl comes on the scene in search of hams in the storehouse of the Caribou Lodge. The Cave Girl blithely steals food from the storehouse because she has on her hands a sick professor who has written a hook about the joys of depending entirely on roots, wild berries, the flesh of birds and beasts slain in the hunt, and so on.

The Cave Girl, being a cave girl, wishes her foster-father, the professor, to keep his delusions undisturbed, so she kindly steals hams.

which she serves under the guise of venison, and the innocent professor licks his chops and gradually recovers his health.

The play plainly drew its inspiration from "The Admirable Crichton," and the authors attempt to convey some parlor philosophy: such as that cave girls cheerfully cook and bind up the wounds of their men, that city girls are selfish and undomestic, and so on. It also seeks to convey an idea of the inept helplessness and dependence on servants of luxurious New York people when forced to live, houseless and unprovided with stores, in the virgin woods during a month of summer. The Cave Girl, like Bill Crichton, takes command of the helpless group, and they gradually learn to hunt, fish, and find the wild fruits of the forest.

"The Cave Girl" serves very well to amuse a couple of idle hours. If the management had not taken such pains to mount the play appropriately—giving a very pretty autumnal scene in the forest—and if the company had not tackled the always strenuous work of comedy with due diligence, one might think, viewing the untouched youth of Emily Pinter and Rafael Brunetto, that there was carelessness somewhere. For these two are supposed to be, if not middle-aged, certainly of mature years; but of that their appearance gave no indication whatsoever. Emily Pinter had airily dabbed the powder puff on her pretty temple locks, but Mr. Brunetto didn't touch his raven hair and didn't look a day over twenty-eight.

Miss Harvey and Ben Erway had the best acting rôles, the latter rising young man giving quite a good representation of a "pretty Pierre" type of guide speaking very creditable broken English, while the leading lady carried her masculine costume and her rôle very jauntily.

THE ORPHEUM.

The Orpheum hill begins this week with Lord and Fuller in odds and ends: trick riding, patter, juggling by the man, violin frivolous by the woman, who obligingly dispenses with skirts. The costume looked rather chilly in this cool November weather, but the legs revealed are exceedingly symmetrical, so we don't mind if she doesn't.

Varvara entertains with the piano and is a crackerjack at piano vaudeville stunts, doing wonders with one hand, accomplishing the effect of playing the "Lucia" sextet with full chords.

Hyman and Virginia Mann give a farce-comedy hearing on the h. c. l., woman's love of gowns and automobiles, and the desire of mankind to gratify his womankind in this respect—and himself. A plot is laid by the employee to do the employer by getting a raise, in which he succeeds, and everybody, including the audience, is happy.

Glenn and Jenkins do strenuous blackface comedy, and incidentally get in enough physical exercise to set up any self-respecting liver for a year or so. The two darkys quarrel, of course—what blackface comedians do not?—and the faithful audience laughs consumedly.

Bohne and Nelson, two big-voiced comedians, sing and joke and, like the two darkys, well earn their board and keep by their hard work, finally working up to a big hit. I tell you, these two couples earn their money. Eddie Nelson wept so realistically at first that he was in great danger of exciting the sympathies of the audience. Finally he began to fizzle—metaphorically, I mean—like a bottle of champagne, and then he had them. The audience also enjoyed their back-and-forth 1/16 operatic singing.

The Barr twins are two pretty young girls astonishingly counterparts of each other, who sing mildly, dance prettily, and costume themselves gorgeously. There is such a sympathetic rapport between the colors of the music, the dance, the costumes, that the act—the girl part being good to look at—is a great success.

The scream of the hill is the long, long comedian Frank Kellam. Patricia O'Dare isn't half bad, but little Frankie would cut out anything.

Frank is a spontaneous fun-maker, a born burlesquer, and as the gusts of funniness swept over him in gales, the tearful audience let out such hoots that Frank was obliged to be ridiculous with his legs, his arms, his hat, any old thing that didn't need to be heard. He gave a deliriously funny take-off of the warbler of a sentimental ballad, and entirely broke up the resistance of the few survivors who were not mowed down by his fun artillery.

"Vanities of 1920" is a girl show, exploiting shapes, costumes, jokes, high kickings, piano stunts, and some very juvenile-voiced singing. The costuming in the regular costume show is very showy.

THE MOVIE STUDIOS.

Five years ago they began to use artificial light in the moving-picture studios. It has taken the men in the business nearly all of those five years to realize what that meant, for now the location of a movie studio is not limited to near-rainless territory. That means that San Francisco will soon have a new picture-play complexion, following a lively picture-play industry. But it doesn't mean that the studios will be located in San Francisco, although it is here that the resultant business will hum. Today 80 per cent. of the motion pictures of the entire country are made in Los Angeles. New York can claim 15 per cent., and scattered communities the remaining 5 per cent.

Nowadays fogs and rain don't count, although, oddly enough, even the indoor business seems to lose heart on rainy days. However, Marin County is regarded as desirable territory for studios, because in a year's tally taken within the last year or so it was found that there were seven more days of sunshine in Marin than in Los Angeles County.

San Mateo County is also regarded with great favor by the men in the picture-play business, because of its contiguity and land accessibility to San Francisco, the real estate of which is too high-priced to command the attention of the movie men.

Los Angeles is fighting hard to retain its proud preeminence as the centre of the picture-play industry. It will succeed, too, for there are too many picture-play millions already invested in that city of magnificent distances. Besides, in Los Angeles the entire community works as a unit, while San Franciscans do not work at all, in spite of the large issues involved.

Mr. H. H. Van Loan is the pioneer here, and has a staff of 300 men working hard to hurry up the completion of his twelve-unit studio in San Mateo, to be known as the Pacific Unit Corporation.

"We get all the rough spots," said this well-known story-writer and picture-play magnate as he ruefully surveyed the indolent San Franciscans leaving him severely alone in his efforts to start the ball a-rolling. Mr. Van Loan will have to console himself from an altruistic viewpoint, and at least he can make future brags of being the pioneer after the business is firmly established on a big basis, after numerous studios have sprung into being, after haughty movie celebrities begin making the money fly, and after our indolent business population finally hoists itself up and begins to take notice.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

THE PALACE OF FINE ARTS.

The four years of experimental work that has been maintained at the Palace of Fine Arts has been so encouragingly endorsed by the public that the organization—newly named the San Francisco Museum of Art—responsible for these activities approved, for its first undertaking, an art exhibit of considerable magnitude. It was planned, under the directorship of Mr. J. Nilsen Laurvik, to secure from such of the Eastern galleries as had a complaisant management the loan of paintings sufficient in quality, number, and scope to form a typical exposition of the chronology of art development in Europe beginning with the fourteenth and continuing down to and through the eighteenth century.

The familiarity of Mr. Laurvik with the contents of the noted art galleries of this country enabled him to plan out the exhibit in detail, the proprietors of the pictures proving in the majority of cases public spirited enough to lend with good grace for so commendable a purpose.

As a result San Francisco is enjoying a rare educational and cultural opportunity, the like of which is not apt to recur again for a very long time to come. For in the exhibit, which affords a complete example of the epoch covered, there are examples of the art of such Titans as El Greco, Tintoretto, Veronese; of Rubens, Van Dyke, and Rembrandt. There is a Watteau, a Greuze, several fine examples of Mme. Le Brun's joyous art, and some characteristic Davids. There are pictures by Turner, by Reynolds, by Gainsborough. There are a couple of Constables, a Romney, and several choice Raeburns, the whole exhibit being arranged in a series of galleries according to the school of which each painting is typical.

Thus the first gallery is an exhibit of paintings illustrative of the severely ascetic art dominated by Byzantine influence, including examples merging into those typical of the School of Siena, culminating in several choice examples of El Greco's hold and independent art; El Greco, who, breaking away from the finely patterned and ascetic formalism of the older school, with its meticulous symbolism, presented larger, finer, grander conceptions, and lent a chastely rich humanity to his saints and angels, however rapt they might be in ecstatic contemplation. His St. John and the Virgin in this gallery offer fine illustrations of El Greco's endowment of his figures with that simple humanness already referred to, the Virgin worshipping with modest, womanly humility, her eyes bent downward before the heavenly miracle of the divine presence—for these were once altar pieces, placed each side of the central august image—while St. John's face and figure express a more masculine, ardent outpouring of a holy youth's fervent adoration. The ecclesiastical character of the pictures, their air of antiquity, and the numerous golden nimbi in relief encircling the heads of the hierarchies of saints and angels make the beholder feel as if he were in a European gallery. For never before, not even in Exposition times, have we in California been privileged to see such ancient examples of the art of the old masters. The surface of the pictures is like a beautiful, fine, smooth enamel, typical of the paintings of that era when painters ground and mixed their own colors and gave them permanency. The softening hand of time has no doubt beautified the colors, and the fine crackle on the faces is so even that it, also, lends a beauti-

"Bernal Heights and Bernal Avenue were named for the family of Juan Francisco Bernal, a soldier of Anza's company."—The Beginnings of San Francisco, by El-dredge.

College Hill is a spur of Bernal Heights, its name being reminiscent of St. Mary's College, which stood just off the Mission Road near what is now the northern approach to the Mission Viaduct. College Hill Reservoir (to the northwest of Holly Park), was completed in May, 1871.

By means of a 30-inch pipeline with a capacity of eight million gallons daily, it receives water from Lakes San Andres and Pilar-citos in San Mateo County. Its storage capacity is 14 million gallons.

It is 225 feet above sea level. Two distributing pipelines carry its water to the "middle service area" of San Francisco—the territory elevated from 40 to 200 feet above city base.

"The site originally contemplated for the college was a block of six fifty-vara lots bounded by Larkin, Grove, Hayes and Polk Streets. It has been decided that this is a plat altogether too limited for the extensive plans contemplated, and Archbishop Alemany has allotted to the purpose a tract of 60 acres, originally intended for a cemetery, situated near the south line of the county, on the old San Jose Road and within six blocks of the line of the San Jose Railroad."—Henry G. lying touch to these interesting examples of the art of an older day.

Beyond this first exhibit are displayed in a series of galleries a large number of examples of various schools; the gallery of Italian and Spanish paintings including works illustrative of the Sienese and the Florentine influence, while in the exhibit of Flemish, Dutch, and German paintings the student may observe the gradual emergence into a more realistic style.

In these galleries may be found the works of many renowned artists: Rubens, Van Dyke, Rembrandt, De Heem, Cuyp. There is a Goyer in the Spanish exhibit, and a Chardin and a Watteau in the French, and several Thomas Lawrences in the British to add to the illustrious names already mentioned.

That this exhibit contains the finest examples of the work of the many renowned artists represented is not claimed. The expenses in crating, shipping, insuring, and hanging the pictures was very heavy; so heavy that although the exhibit has served as the motif for a trip to San Francisco of many well-to-do people who live on the Pacific Coast—and in some cases even as far as Hawaii—yet it was hardly expected that the admission charges could by any possibility be expected even approximately to pay the heavy expenses incurred.

To the opportunity offered by an exhibit of this scope and quality the public has responded eagerly. Eight thousand entrances were registered in the first fifteen days. That does not sound as big as it is, for an art exhibit only appeals to a limited proportion of a community. Hence the undoubted deficit after the exhibit is over will be made up by the committee of patrons and patronesses.

The first edition of a handsome and very complete illustrated catalogue, which contains a long introduction very enlightening to the humble seeker for light, has already been sold out. Large numbers of people are going on Sundays, when the price of admission is reduced from 50 cents to 25 cents.

Three lecturers, comprising Director Laurvik, Mrs. James, and Professor Clark of Stanford, have been kept busy explaining, expounding, and interpreting to interested visitors, and the public attention paid to the exhibit has been such as to warrant an extension of the original time fixed. At present November 21st is the limit of the time, but there are hopes in the breasts of constant visitors that it may be extended another week or so.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

After several years upon the metropolitan stages of New York and Chicago, David Belasco's drama, "Tiger Rose," at last takes to the road and we are promised its presentation starting Monday, November 15th, when its story will be told upon the Columbia's ample stage. The theme of "Tiger Rose" is a serious one. The sorrow of its central figures never fail to make an audience weep, yet few attractions, we are told, incite so much laughter.

Aside from psychological reasons is the fact that Willard Mack, its author, injected into "Tiger Rose" a delicious comedy vein to offset the too high tension that would otherwise prevail. In the character of Michael Devlin he is said to have created an Irishman possessed of keen wit with an irresistible tendency to share it with those whose lives he touches. The big, swaggering Northwest mounted policeman entertains an opinion of his personal charm that is a source of amusement.

The broken English and the quaint speech of the storm-tossed little heroine of "Tiger Rose" are a source of amusement, and another thing that brings the heartiest laughter is the fluent swearing by Rose. Conscious of her cleanliness and held by the force and beauty of her love, her audience will become hilarious when ready profanity ripples from the girl's lips.

In the cast selected by Mr. Belasco himself are Signorina Francesca Cappellano, who plays Rose; Bernard J. McOwen, as the policeman; Emilie Lessing, a native Californian, as the Indian squaw; Charles Riegel, James Lewis, J. J. Bertin, and others equally well known.

The Alcazar Theatre.

"The Eternal Magdelene," to have first Alcazar staging at next Sunday's matinee, has provoked wide discussion. It created a sensation for months when Julia Arthur enacted the woman in New York. Its recent revivals in Eastern theatres are breaking its previous box-office records. The theme is as old as the world and will never die. Into its fearless exposition the brilliant young playwright, Robert McLaughlin, put his very heart and soul. His play is acknowledged, even by his sternest censors, as a tremendous emotional work. "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone," is its keynote. As a "woman of the town," a reincarnation of the pathetic figure that has come down through the ages, Elwyn Harvey will be enabled to reveal a new phase of her artistry. Dudley Ayres also has a powerful rôle as Elijah Bradshaw, "the exemplary citizen," with Charles Yule as Gleason, the sensational evangelist; Emily Pinter as a woman of the submerged tenth, Ben Erway as the dissipated young ruler, Rafael Brunetto as the level-headed newspaper reporter, the cast also including Edna Peckham, Gladys Emmons, Henry Shumer, Al Cunningham, Walter Belasco, Frederick Green, and Charles Murphy.

In preparation for Thanksgiving week is Rachel Crothers' recent New York comedy success, "A Little Journey," a romance of westbound overland travel in a Pullman car, culminating with a train wreck in the desert.

The Orpheum.

Laughter and music are the features of "The Spirit of Mardi Gras," headliner on next week's Orpheum bill, starting Sunday. Stage pictures, beautiful in their conception and presentation, will combine with striking costumes and the work of able artists of song, dance, and music to make this a spectacle extraordinary.

Bert Baker serves a dual capacity in vaudeville, that of author and comedian. His present vehicle is a farce called "Prevarication" and deals with a husband who is a distant relative of Ananias, a jealous wife, a private secretary, and his decidedly pretty fiancée.

When it comes to card manipulation, Leipzig is as much ahead of his competitors as the ace is above the deuce. He wears the medal of the "Magic Circle," a society of English magicians.

Marie Sabbot and George Brooks have put into a shaker some dances, some dialogues, some songs, and some infectious laughs, and mixed them with delightful personalities.

Claude and Marion continue in vaudeville with "The Argument Still Unsettled." As long as this argument remains without adjustment theatre-goers are assured of fun a-plenty.

Willie Hale and Brother are cosmopolites in vaudeville. Their turn is called "Bits of Vaudeville" and is a miscellaneous assortment of clever comedy, juggling, tumbling, and xylophone playing.

John and Nellie Olms, who style themselves "The Watch Wizards," are indeed wizards—wizards of the prestidigitator type, and their skilful and at times uncanny performance is with watches.

The beautiful and accomplished Barr Twins, Evelyn and Gertrude, will remain one more week in their "Riot of Color."

The Maitland Playhouse.

Theatre-goers of the Bay section will be pleased to learn of the presentation for this coming week at the Maitland of the old-time Maude Adams success, "Quality Street." It was originally written by James M. Barrie for Miss Adams, and her tour of the country was an overwhelming triumph. The story is that of a young girl whose family has suddenly lost its fortune. She is forced to earn her living as a schoolteacher, but in the end she loves wisely and well and all turns out to the pleasure of the audience.

Mary Morris, who had a strong part in "The Faith Healer" recently, is cast for the rôle that Maude Adams made famous. J. Anthony Smythe, last year's favorite, who has rejoined Director Arthur Maitland, will be seen for the first time in "Quality Street."

For the remainder of this week, closing with the Saturday night performance, the play is Oscar Wilde's "The Importance of Being Earnest."

Raoul Vidas.

It was perhaps natural that young Raoul Vidas, who will be heard at the Scottish Rite Auditorium, Sunday afternoon, December 5th, in joint recital with Charles Hackett, leading tenor of the Metropolitan, under the local direction of Frank W. Healy, should have inherited some musical talent from his father, a musician of no mean ability and who was the boy's first teacher. When, however, at the age of five, in his native city of Bucharest, the Modern School of Music saw fit to have him appear in public for the first time at one of their concerts given in the famous Athenæum, Roumania's largest hall, the interest of the public was aroused.

Many found it necessary to stand in order to see the tiny performer, and the tremendous success achieved by this small child's playing brought him renown.

He was seven years old when the royal request came that he appear at the concert given by the late Queen Carmen Sylvia in the palace for the intellectuals—the lettered ones, so to speak—of her country.

Besides Raoul Vidas and Charles Hackett, Mr. Healy will present Louis Graveure, king of concert haritones; Leo Ornstein, the Russian pianist, and Mme. Frances Alda, leading soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House. These concerts will also take place at the Scottish Rite Auditorium. Subscriptions to the entire series of concerts may be had at $4, $6, and $8, the prices for single admissions being $1.50, $2, and $2.50.

Players Theatre.

The ambitious venture of the Players Club in establishing what is at present the only successful repertory theatre in America has met with the hearty approval of the drama-loving public of San Francisco.

The final two weeks of the fall season begins Monday with a number of extra performances of Gilbert and Sullivan's "Ruddigore." "Hamlet," with William S. Rainey, will be given its last performance this year on Friday evening, the 12th. Tolstoy's "Fedya" is scheduled for Wednesday night, and the last performance of the bill of one-act plays, including "The China King's Daughter" with a cast of real Chinese and Dan Totheroh's thriller, on Friday night, November 19th. The "Ruddigore" dates are as follows: Saturday, 13th; Monday, 15th; Tuesday, 16th; Thursday, 18th; and Saturday, 20th.

Mobilizing the Power Production.

Four leading scientific societies are studying a plan for mobilizing the power production of a large section of territory between Boston and Washington. The idea is to link up all of the efficient electrical plants in this region, whether operated with water or coal. Long-distance transmission is now entirely feasible. By connecting these plants it will become possible to create a great reservoir of electrical energy which may be tapped as required at any hour of the day and in any part of the territory. Under a modern system coal

The Restaurant Refined

Sixteen years in the service of San Francisco and her visitors. Holding constantly to the same ideal of fulfilling all and only the legitimate functions of a restaurant, it has not been necessary to alter the character of this restaurant's appeal to its patrons.

Breakfast, Luncheon, Tea and Dinner would not be brought out of the mines at all. It would be fed from the veins directly into furnaces and converted into electrical energy. When we become civilized in our industrial development we shall burn comparatively little coal in old-fashioned boilers. Instead of carrying coal to the cities at a tremendous expense to be burned under costly furnaces with a sickening waste of heat and smoke, we will distribute by electric wire. We will operate the railroads by electricity and carry on all of our industrial operations in the same manner. The plan of the four societies means a great power monopoly as a matter of course, but we are learning to look upon monopoly with less terror than formerly, and we are willing to run some risk in order to secure the enormous benefits that are easily possible of attainment.—Nebraska State Journal.

The island of Majorca, one of the Balearic Isles off the coast of Spain in the Mediterranean Sea, is believed to have the finest climate in the world. The temperature remains practically stationary at 76 degrees and breezes blow constantly.

Telephone companies in large cities are abandoning the familiar "I'm ringing them" song of the operator. An "audible ringer" that causes a purr in the ear of the caller is being installed.

VANITY FAIR.

We are told that the famous Ritz Hotel in London has been Americanized, and we are rather inclined to resent the constant application of this word to our vices rather than to our virtues. In this case Americanization means that you can have your lunch in five minutes and for the sum of 60 cents, which seems to be a rather high price for dyspepsia.

This frantic haste over meals is an affectation that flourishes in the East rather than in the West. And it is only an affectation. The Easterner, and particularly the New Yorker, who rushes about like a wet hen is not any busier than any one else. He is not going anywhere. He is simply rushing. The same man who eats his lunch like a cormorant will be seen after lunch taking his leisurely ease in the harbor shop. He will spend twenty minutes in having his nails manicured and another ten minutes in the shoelack chair. He is not actually in a hurry. He has nothing special to do, but he has acquired the habit of rushing. The man who has really important things to do will not be found risking his health at the quick lunch table. He will regard his meal as of equal importance with everything else. Generals in the field do not neglect their meals. The men who actually do things are never in a hurry.

But it is good to know that London restaurants are trying to reform themselves. They needed reform before the war, and certainly they need it now. One may not wish to eat in a hurry, but we all like to have our meals quickly served and we like to have food that need not be eaten with the eyes closed and of which the odor is at least not offensive. London restaurateurs say now that the appetite of the public needs tempting. It is not what it was. The strain of the war has had its effect on the general health and the disposition to eat has waned. But another curious reason is advanced. We are told that the popular interest in spiritualism has had an adverse effect on the general appetite. Now why should that be? It is true that ghosts are not given to eating and drinking. In this respect they may be said to set an example of abstinence. But why should an intercourse with ghosts have this depressing effect on those who are still mortal and whose physical bodies must be sustained by something more substantial than spirit communications. There have been times when we ourselves have gayly sported with the ouija board, even lending heed to the giddy gyrations of the moving table. But we never noticed that these diversions had a prejudicial effect upon the appetite. It may be that our state of mind was too materialistic, that we were unable to ascend to those planes where food becomes a superfluity. Evidently there is more in the ouija board than meets the eye. The restaurateur may complain, but the average citizen, oppressed by the H. C. of L., is likely to welcome any expedient that will help him to heat the prices offered. As the noon hour draws near he will saunter around to the séance room instead of to the eating joint, or he may carry his little ouija board in his pocket and seek celestial food in the privacy of his office. And who knows? In the same way he may find a substitute for heat and so beat the coal bill. Indeed this would be even more logical when one comes to think of it. We should hate to elaborate the idea, but it seems probable that communications with spirits would so suggest the idea of heat, so to speak, as to make the usual heating appliances superfluous. The idea might be worked out in some detail, but this may be left for a more auspicious occasion. It is enough now to point out the possibilities.

Most reputable newspapers during the course of the campaign paid no heed to the insidious lie—a lie that traveled quickly as do all such lies—that Senator Harding had negro blood in his veins. Beyond one or two authoritative contradictions this particular lie was allowed to do its worst, although we may doubt if it changed a single vote beyond that of a few imbeciles who ought not to be allowed to vote anyway. But now that the election is over the story may be noted, and perhaps that may best be done by a quotation from the Times-Star of Cincinnati, of which Mr. Charles P. Taft is publisher. The Times-Star says:

"The story is to the effect that Warren G. Harding's grandfather was Amos Harding and that he married Mary Ann Dixon, a negro. The story is false in every respect. It even has the wrong names for Harding's grandparents. The senator's grandfather was not Amos, but Charles Alexander Harding. Charles Alexander Harding's wife, and the grandmother of Warren G. Harding on the paternal side, was Mary Ann Crawford. She was the daughter of Joshua Crawford of Baltimore and Sophia Stevens, whose family lived in Albemarle County, Virginia. The Crawfords were of Scotch-Irish descent, the family originating in Lanarkshire, Scotland. The first of the family came to America in the seventeenth century.

"The Crawfords appear all through the genealogies of Virginia and are related to most of the prominent families of Colonial days in that state. There was an Amos Harding among Warren G. Harding's ancestors. He was not the senator's grandfather, however, but his great-great-grandfather. The name of his wife was not Mary Ann Dixon, but Phoebe Tripp, who belonged to a well-known Colonial family of Pennsylvania and was a cousin of Frances Slocum, 'the lost sister of Wyoming.'

"Amos Harding lived in the Wyoming Valley, Pennsylvania, from 1777 to 1800. He came to Richland County, Ohio, early in the nineteenth century, and died there in 1839.

"As a rule Americans object to lies, and particularly to that type of lie which flourishes only in the dark. Unless the character of our people has changed they will know on election day exactly what they think of the subterranean campaign the Democrats have waged during the past three weeks.

"A political campaign that can not be run in the open, free press of America is not to the credit of any party or candidate. We give below Harding's family tree. It is an ancestry of which any American might be proud. We shall be glad to answer questions about any of the men or women whose names are given and are prepared to prove that there was not a drop of negro blood in any one of them."

The Growling Fish.

A fish that growls and meows like a cat is found in certain parts of South America, Africa, and Australia, and this is considered by scientists to be in many respects the most wonderful fish in the world. It looks much more like a snake than a fish. It has lungs and is obliged to put its head out of water frequently to breathe. Lung fish, as these creatures are called, are a link between reptiles and fishes—the nearest kind to the original stock from which snakes and fishes both sprang, and in the fossil period these ancestors of theirs were scattered over the entire world. One reason these strange fish have been preserved thousands and thousands of years after their pre-historic ancestors were extinct is because they can live easily through long droughts. Alligators and their African cousins, the crocodiles, are almost the only enemies they have to fear except man.

Their rich salmon flesh is highly prized by the Indians, who go after them with spears.

In the natural state, the African lung fish is about eighteen inches long, but when kept in aquariums and fed the year round, instead of lying dormant for lack of water, they grow to be two feet and a half long and weigh six pounds or more.

It is a fact that there are fish which can not swim. A Brazilian fish, called the maltha, can only crawl, walk, or hop. It has a long, upturned snout, and resembles to some extent a toad. The anterior fins of the maltha are quite small and are not able to get on the water. They are in reality thin paws which are of no service for swimming.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Mary had been brought up, so to speak, in the front seat of her father's motor-car. At ten she took her first train journey. When they made the first stop she looked surprised. Leaning out of the window, she inquired anxiously of the conductor, who had just swung himself off the platform: "What's the matter? Killed your engine?"

Courtlandt Bleecker, at a dinner in Bar Harbor, deplored the tendency toward immodesty that still persists in women's fashions. "However," he said, and as he spoke he raised on high his sparkling glass of ginger ale, "however, we can always hope for the best, and so, ladies and gentlemen, I offer the toast: 'Here's to the low neck and the short skirts—may they never meet.'"

"I wish," the customer explained, "an alarm clock; one that will waken the servant, but not all the rest of the household." "I am sorry, madam," the jewelry responded regretfully, "but there isn't any such thing. However, I have in all the leading makes the regular kind—those which will waken all the rest of the house without disturbing the slumbers of the servant."

Mrs. Nan Brown, the noted settlement worker, during an earnest plea for funds at the Cooper Institute said: "The great problem now is to educate our immigrant children. Not only do they not understand our language and our ways, but the war has practically taken from them all sense of right and wrong. A typical case in point is that of the little boy who was recently sent to the reform school. A neighbor was trying to console the lad's mother. 'Yes,' said the latter, 'it is a shame. He was such a good boy, too. Everything he stole he used to bring right home to me.'"

A young couple rushed into the marriage license bureau recently and announced to the clerk that they wished to be married at once. Dan Cupid's executive officer surveyed the couple from under grizzled brows and said severely: "I'm afraid this is a runaway match." "Well, your honor," returned the prospective groom, "I can't exactly say we ran, but we walked pretty fast."

Pat Moran, manager of the Cincinnati Reds, gambled during the spring training season on a lanky youth from the bushes who thought he could pitch. While he was in the box the team hatted twice around, and then Moran pulled him out. "I was away off today," apologized the aspirant. "You bet you were," said Moran. "But you weren't anywhere near as far off as you will be tomorrow at this time. You're released."

She was a stranger to London and was traveling from Brixton to the Elephant and Castle. She had worried the passengers on either side of her as to whether she was nearing her destination. Finally, getting really anxious, she reached over and deliberately poked the conductor with her umbrella. "Tell me, my man," she said. "Tell me, is this the Elephant and Castle?" "No, ma'am, it isn't," sharply replied the man. "It's the conductor."

A number of New York sportsmen, putting up at Bill Barker's Maine camp, found their sport much interfered with by rain. Still—fine or wet—the old-fashioned barometer that hung in Bill's general room persistently refused to "set fair." At last one of the party drew Bill's attention to this curious glass. "Don't you think," he said, "that there's something the matter with your glass?" "No, sir," answered Bill indignantly. "She's a good glass an' a powerful one; but," he added reflectively, "she aint moved by trifles."

George C. Clancy, professor of rhetoric at Beloit College, has the reputation of indulging in rather sharp repartee in his classroom. One of his pupils, a star at football, but not at rhetoric, had spent most of the hour in looking at his watch, yawning and sighing. At the close of the lecture Professor Clancy spoke. "Mr. Smith, why have you looked at your watch every few minutes during the last hour?" Smith got out that he had kept looking at his watch to assure himself that it was still running. "I suppose," retorted the professor, "that you have been sighing every few minutes to assure yourself that you are still breathing."

A Federal official at Washington has discovered that he has still something to learn touching agriculture. Now he purchased a farm as a summer home for his family and finds special delight in walking about the place, commenting on the condition of the crops, and in many ways showing his interest in his possessions. One evening during the summer he was strolling over the farm. The hired man had cut the grass during the day—a very thin crop—and left it on the ground to dry. The official saw it and, calling his man, said: "It appears to me that you are very careless. Why haven't you been more particular in raking up this hay? Don't you see that you have left drihhings all around?" For a moment the hired man stared, wondering whether his boss was quizzing him. Then he replied: "Drihhings? Why, sir, that's the crop."

At last little Freddy was allowed to visit grandpa all alone. They were great friends and had long waited for the great day. Freddy had the time of his life. Grandpa saw that he wanted for nothing. The small boy gobbled cake and pie to his heart's content, while his pockets bulged all the time with sweets. But there comes an end to everything and Freddy went home again, pale yellow of complexion, and languid and feverish. Mother promptly sent for the doctor, who ordered him to bed and sent him some very disagreeable medicine. Grandpa came next day and was permitted to creep upstairs to see how the sufferer was faring. He found the small boy lying wan and pale on his pillow, but received a watery smile of welcome. "Oh, grandpa," said the weak little voice, "I've been awfully sick, but it was worth it."

A New York theatrical manager was much annoyed by the persistent applications for a "job" made to him by a most peculiar-looking and seedy individual. Time and time again, it appears, the manager had referred this person to his stage manager. "Talk to Hodgkins," he would say, interrupting the man's attempts to name his qualifications. Finally the seedy man in search of a job did seek Hodgkins, the stage manager, who at that time was in the theatre, listening to the efforts of candidates for the chorus. As there were a number ahead of him, the peculiar-looking person would, between songs, interrupt the stage manager with his requests for a job. Exasperated, the stage manager at length turned to the pianist and made him play an accompaniment for the stranger. With some hesitancy the applicant for the job employed what voice he had in song. It was as bad as had could be. Disgusted, the manager stopped him. "And you have the nerve to ask for a job?" he demanded wrathfully. "Certainly," replied the man. "Why, you can't sing a note," said the manager, astonished. "I don't claim to be able to sing," replied the seedy one calmly. "And I don't want to sing. I am a stage carpenter. I was only singing to please you people."

Ashes of Shooting Stars.

"Shooting stars" is an unfortunate name for small masses weighing usually only a few ounces that enter the earth's atmosphere from outer space, are ignited by friction with the air, glow brightly for a few seconds and then fall to the surface in the form of dust. These meteors enter the earth's atmosphere by the millions every day, but only a small percentage is visible to the naked eye at any one place. They fall by day and by night, over land and sea, in polar regions and in the tropics. The snowy wastes of the far north are dusted with the ashes of shooting stars that have been consumed by friction with the earth's atmosphere, which they enter at a speed varying from ten to forty miles a second.

Astronomers quite frequently observe meteoric particles, invisible to the naked eye, flitting across the field of the telescope.

Some of the larger of these masses weigh several pounds, in rarer instances even several hundred pounds. They are thus referred to as meteorites or fireballs. These are not entirely consumed by friction with the earth's atmosphere, but after traveling with loud reports and explosions a distance of many miles, fall to the earth's surface.

Comets, it is generally believed, disintegrate gradually into swarms of meteors and the earth and other planets are constantly encountering these fragmentary particles in their journeys around the sun. Erodic swarms are encountered at certain definite times of the year whenever the earth's path crosses the paths of these disintegrated comets.

The Fighters.

We die who had forgotten how to live;
The flashing of sword-blade bright and bare Consoled us for all life promised and might not give,
Saved us from lust, from memory and despair.

And that loud crying breaking up our sleep,
That dread, disastrous summons heard at morn,
Heard and obeyed, gave us our souls to keep
Who had forgotten the reason we were born.

More dangerous our dreams, our sick delight
More sorrowful, than in the thousand-fold
Ambiguous coils of the unending fight
That death whose bitterest pang is still untold.

Ab! Not from passion did we seek release
But from our comforts—satisfied desires,
From that long masquerade which was not peace,
From little triumphs, fatigue, and sleeping fires.

So from our exultation may take shape
Peace which is neither merchandise nor lust,
Nor that false ease men hunger to escape,
Which is but war without the bayonet trust.

Flesh of our flesh, bone of our bone, we die
To give peace birth—peace once born among men,
Deformed and stained and twisted into a lie:
We die to bring that peace to earth again.

—From "Selected Poems," by Lady Margaret Sackville. Published by E. P. Dutton & Co.

Child of Adam.

You are sick, O child of Adam.
And there is no peace in your house of flesh
Or joy where your engines reel!
You have put your hope in the rods that rust,
You are watching the world through a turning wheel.

You search no more for eternal things
Or infinite splendors locked in your name—
Your hands must touch and your eyes must see.
The music of gold and the heart are the same.

You are sick, O child of Adam!
You glut your flesh but your spirit begs.
You have lost your love of the task well done.
The iron worms of an iron age
Are boring into your breast—
Go follow an unconcerning dream
And heal your soul of this deep unrest!
Give up yourself to the passionate call
Of multiple truth, become aware
Of beauty lodged in the simplest thing
And life aspiring everywhere!

Go and fall in love with a star,
Look at the blood through a tube of glass,
Watch the wedding of earth and seed,
Study the rocks and the green sea-grass.
Send your mind through time to follow
Tangent lines and fugitive numbers,
Build a race from a hit of bone
Found where the asp of Asia slumbers,
Know the motive back of the deed,
Solve the riddle of thought and brain,
Make a world for the sake of man,
Be at ease with the days again!

You are sick, indeed, O child of Adam!
There is only greed where you stand and work,
And hate where your banners go:
The cogs and the gears of your great machines
Are killing the things by which you grow.
Let the wheels run down and the towers crack,
Let the cannon rust and the fires die—
You must learn to wonder again at life
And see again with your inward eye!
—Scudder Middleton in the Nation.

In Japan the telephone number 8 commands a higher price from subscribers than any other. This number, written in its Japanese character, means success and prosperity and costs the subscriber $500 a year. Another lucky number is 357, for the reason that it is the custom to present children to the Deity on their third, fifth, and seventh birthdays. As a general rule odd numbers are considered luckier than even numbers. Numbers 42 and 49 are particularly unlucky in the eyes of the Japanese. The former is pronounced "shini," which means death; the latter, "shiku," meaning distress and suffering. These numbers are carefully avoided by subscribers, and are usually allotted to police stations, asylums, and similar institutions.

The government has warned the people to look for the orange in their orange drinks. Many of the drinks are just sugar and water with a dash of color, says Washington.

The West Indians used snuff long before tobacco was introduced into Europe.

SPIRITUALISM ON THE AMAZON.

The original exponents of spiritualism were found among the tribes in the region around the head waters of the Amazon by early Spanish explorers, and savage séances are still held there with exactly the same rites as those witnessed by the Europeans so long ago.

The mediums do not employ rappings, table-tipping, or the dark cabinet to call up the dead, but their ceremonies are weird and spectacular in the extreme. When a member of the tribe desires to talk with a deceased relative or friend he visits the medium and states his wish, at the same time making advance payment in the form of feathers, fruit, and various jungle delicacies. The medium requests him to return at a certain hour the next night with as many guests as he cares to invite in honor of the departed spirit.

As soon as the man goes away the medium builds a fire of scented woods, over which he steepes a decoction of green herbs. Many of these herbs are deadly poison, but are so skillfully mixed in measured quantities that one acts as an antidote to the other.

At the appointed time the spiritualist and his invited guests appear and seat themselves in a circle around the fire, but at a respectful distance from it. Absolute silence reigns save for the regular tap of a drum sounded at intervals by a man stationed in the deep shadows beyond the fire.

The medium appears bearing aloft a coconut shell filled with the brew of herbs. He scatters the glowing fire to form a ring and steps into the middle of it, first laying fragrant green sticks on the live coals. Soon clouds of thick smoke rise and envelop him, the men around the fire break into a wild incantation, the drum is furiously beaten, and in the midst of the uproar the medium drinks the poison and casts the empty coconut shell among the spectators. Immediately the chant ceases, the drum is silent, and every eye is fixed on the medium, dimly visible through the smoke.

The drugs take effect at once, his eyes roll, his mouth twitches, his body writhes, and unintelligible cries issue from his lips. These cries are believed to be the voice of the departed. The man who has thus caused the dead to be summoned proceeds to ask questions of the spirit. The spirits are consulted about everything that happens in the village, tribal or family quarrels, contemplated journeys, stolen property, even the planting of crops, and the frenzied and guttural utterances of the suffering medium groveling on the ground in the throes of pain are interpreted by the eager listeners as replies. When the medium finally succumbs to exhaustion and lies motionless in the embers of the sacred fire the assemblage disperses.

These mediums are regarded with great fear and respect and wield more influence in the tribe than the chief himself, but the time

Labor Legislation.

Jonathan Bourne, Jr., chairman of the Republican Publicity Association, is anxious that the "open shop" shall form a part of the labor legislation to be inaugurated under the new Administration. We are not told what form Mr. Bourne would wish the new legislation to take, but he asks that it follow the general direction of the open shop.

With all due respect to Mr. Bourne we do not want any legislation at all with regard to the open shop. All that we want is the enforcement of the old legislation, and more particularly of those ancient principles that guarantee to every man the right to live and to work, to make his own contracts, to be his own master, and to conduct his life in the lawful ways most pleasing to himself. All these rights are supposed to be guarded by our existing laws. They have been overridden in a hundred ways. We do not now need any new laws. All that we need is respect for the old ones, a new carefulness for those simplest of human rights that lie at the base of civilization, and without which civilization can not endure.

It is not strange that flagrant class legislation, flagrant discrimination in our law courts, should at last have become so normal as to seem to need legislation for their cure. The spectacle of a President perpetually hat in hand to Mr. Gompers, authorizing legislation specifically exempting labor unions from criminal laws that apply to every one else, the spectacle of a deferential and fawning Congress invariably abject before a labor lobby and before a nation-wide mechanism of coercion, such spectacles as these have naturally set the pace for the whole mass of officialism down to the youngest and rawest policeman. If the new President and the new Congress shall feel that the malady calls for a cure—and there is no greater malady than this—all that they have to do is to see that the Constitution of the United States is obeyed in spirit and in letter, and that no man born under that Constitution shall either be coerced into an organization or punished for remaining outside of it. Such an attitude on the part of the Administration will not fail of its effects upon the lower strata of officialism, and we may yet see the day when all men are equal before the law even in a police court or a mayoralty office.

The Defeat of Wrangel.

When Secretary Colby announced that the Bolshevik government was about to collapse we suspected that bad news would soon be on its way. It has come. The army of General Wrangel has been crushed and the Red forces are now in occupation of the Crimea. Secretary Colby must have been calling on his inner consciousness, but with an external eye on the election. Now we are told comfortingly but idiotically that the Bolsheviks are sure to fall through lack of an enemy to fight against, and so we may congratulate ourselves on their success against Wrangel. But if wars are necessary to the Bolsheviks it seems rather more likely that they will create a war in preference to disintegrating for lack of one. How about a new Polish war?

Does any one seriously suppose that the Soviet government will now thank God that it has crushed its enemies, call home its armies, and proceed with the pacification of its starving people? The whole course of revolutionary history contradicts such an idea. The Soviet government knows well that its only hope of salvation is to win victories and to impress its own people and the world with a sense of its military prowess. It has formally announced that it will call all Asia to arms and its emissaries have already produced a ferment throughout Asia Minor and India, a ferment disastrously fed by the doctrine of self-determination. The road to Asia is now practically open. Turkey is seething with resentment and ready to snatch at any straw to save herself from the peace treaty. Persia is in very much the same state, and British armies further to the south are being seriously pressed. India at the moment seems to be somewhat quieter, but it may be only the telegraph wires that are quieter, and not the people. What must be the effect upon these fierce dark races as they see that the Soviet government has made good its threats and that its armies are able to move in their direction and to overthrow the forces brought against them?

It is true enough that there may be a successful uprising in Russia at any moment, and it is also true that if that should come Europe may find that she has exchanged the frying-pan for the fire. The French Revolution was ended by Napoleon, but this did not mean peace for Europe. Quite the contrary. There can be no successful counter-revolution in Russia except under some great and as yet invisible leader, and are we sure that such a leader would impersonate the prodigal son? It is hardly likely. He would be far more prone to call Russia to a new fury of hate against the nations who stripped her of her possessions, who preached democracy and self-determination to her incompetent provinces and so plunged them in turmoil and anarchy. The counter-revolution will certainly come, and we may hope that it will come soon and before Asia begins to move irresistibly. She is nearly at that point now, a fact, by the way, that might help us to understand the policies of Japan. But the idea that a counter-revolution in Russia would necessarily mean the removal of the Russian trouble is about as fatuous an idea as the human mind is capable of. It would be far more likely to mean that the real Russian trouble was about to begin.

The New Cabinet.

Most of us believe that we are fully qualified to construct a cabinet for Senator Harding. At least, most of us have one or two favorite statesmen who ought on no account to be omitted, or one or two pet aversions who ought on no account to be included. Public opinion, the most valuable of national assets, is formed in just that way.

No one knows anything about the formation of the cabinet that must certainly be grouping itself in Senator Harding's mind. Wise man that he is, he has kept his own counsel in this respect, and perhaps the very fact of his reticence has encouraged the gossips to gossip a little more than usual. But there is still another factor that widens the field of conjecture. Senator Harding has no bills to pay. No one can demand any special recognition for services rendered, although no doubt there are a good many who will try. Mr. Gompers threw the whole weight of his influence—certainly much overestimated—in favor of Mr. Cox, a strange tactical error for one usually so adroit. There is no organization and no interest that can successfully pretend to have laid the new President under obligations for his election. A usual factor in cabinet forecasts is therefore lacking. There is no one who must be "taken care of."

For these reasons we may look somewhat negligently on the confident assertion of a usually well-informed Washington correspondent that neither Mr. Hoover nor General Wood will be included in the cabinet. Mr. Hoover, we are told, is too insistent on having his own way, and General Wood is by no means popular in certain army circles. Moreover, Senator Harding is supposed to entertain the very proper opinion that a civilian ought to be in charge of the service departments, particularly in times of peace. It is a sound idea and consonant with the experience of the world. The secretaries of the army and of the navy ought not to be specialists. The specialist is liable to forget that he is the servant of the nation as a whole.

Now the Argonaut has no particular opinions on the subject of Mr. Hoover, but it has very strong opinions on the general principles that should govern the choice of a cabinet. Mr. Hoover rendered eminent services in an eminent way during the progress of the war. He was the right man in the right place, and it is probable that the world will never know the full extent of its indebtedness to him. But this does not constitute the least evidence that he would shine in the cabinet. There are times when dictatorships are absolutely necessary, times of war and wreck and chaos. But nothing can be more calamitous than dictatorships misplaced. The instincts of autocracy have their values, enormous values, but they have also their enormous mischiefs when they are unseasonable. We have suffered in the past much and grievously from a certain popular conviction that because a man has done some one thing supremely well he can do some other thing equally well. If Senator Harding does not believe that Mr. Hoover is suited to the team work of the cabinet he will do right to pass him over, no matter how conspicuous his ability in spheres where team work was not desirable nor possible. The world is likely to need Mr. Hoover for a long time to come, and it would be the worst of economy to place him where he would be stultified. The Argonaut, for one, will accept Senator Harding's judgment in this respect without question.

But there can be no doubt that we have suffered severely from the almost unbroken mediocrity of our cabinets. Here and there the monotony has been broken by a Blaine or a Root, but such oases as these serve rather to emphasize than to redeem the rounding deserts. The tendency to mediocrity in our cabinets reached the depths under President Wilson. Never before have our governmental departments been placed under control so incapable, so inept, or so mean. Often before it has happened that respectable mediocrity has been exalted to undeserved dignity, but it has never before happened that a mediocrity not even respectable has been regarded as an essential qualification to office, as the sine qua non to presidential favors. The dreary array of Baker, Burleson, Daniels, and the rest of them, the perpetual combination of the red flag and the white feather, is without a precedent in our history.

There is no conceivable reason why we should tolerate commonplace men in the cabinet, and we may confidently believe that we shall not have to tolerate them in the immediate future. We do not want autocrats, but neither do we want insignificances, and there is no reason why we should have either the one or the other. America contains as many men of extraordinary capacity as any country in the world, and probably more. And it may be said that any other country would use them, which certainly we do not. If our Harrimans or Morgans or Hills had been born in Europe they certainly would not have been allowed to spend their immense energies in personal achievements. We should have found those energies enlisted in the service of the nation, and we need not doubt that they would have been willingly given to the greatest and the most delicate of all tasks, and tasks far more satisfying to honorable ambition than the pursuit of individual wealth and power. There is probably no other nation in the world so poor in capacities that it would willingly employ either a Baker or a Daniels or a Burleson in any position above a second-class clerkship, and we may doubt if they could get even that. It is true that these particular appointments are exceptional in their absurdity, but it is none the less true that we have systematically boycotted our best men and driven them to private pursuits rather than invite them to the service of the nation. And there is hardly one among them who would be indifferent to such an invitation. Most of the countries of Europe have governing classes consisting of great families that for generation after generation have given their sons to the political service of the nation. The practice has its advantages in inherited experience and the sense of responsibility, but it is wholly unsuited to America. But that is no reason why we should tolerate nonentities. It is no reason why we should boycott our men who have proved their extraordinary capacities in finance, economics, and industry. We have them in abundance and we ought to use them.

There need be no fear that Senator Harding will fill his cabinet with nonentities. But his task is a difficult one. Capacity is by no means the only essential qualification. For example, we do not want the capacity of a dictator, however great it may be. No one can be a success in the cabinet who is unable respectfully to consider the opinions of his colleagues, who has not the faculty for team work, who does not know how to concede and to defer. These qualities may be said to be moral as much as intellectual and we may believe that Mr. Harding is searching diligently for a combination that is by no means common. We may believe also that he is in no way unaware of the extent to which his fortunes will be presaged by his choice of those who will share with him the great task of government. It will be the first indication of success or failure.

The Fruit and Flower Mission.

It has been the custom of the Argonaut to recommend to its readers the work of the San Francisco Fruit and Flower Mission, and with particular reference to its charitable activities at Thanksgiving. For forty years this mission has been providing nourishing food and delicacies for the needy sick of San Francisco and each year it has given Thanksgiving dinners to the poor. At present the regular work, irrespective of the season, includes the sending of groceries, milk, eggs, fresh vegetables, and fruit to about eighty families. Half of these receive a weekly box of food, the others, particularly those suffering from tuberculosis, get eggs and milk as ordered by their physicians. All these people are regularly visited by the mission's workers, who do all they can to relieve the necessities of their wards. Work such as this needs no recommendation, but it does need publicity. It is a pleasure and a duty to give it. Every penny contributed to the funds of the mission is expended in the most direct and practical way. It means a full penny's worth of comfort to some unfortunate person who is in dire need of it, and at this particular time of the year it means a measure of seasonable hospitality and good cheer to those who would otherwise lack it. The address of the San Francisco Fruit and Flower Mission is 1372 Jackson Street.

The Sufferings of Germany.

Many volumes have already been written to prove that Germany can not possibly comply with the conditions of the peace treaty. They have been ably and conscientiously written, and that their contentions are to some extent justified is proved by the fact that the treaty is being amended and doubtless will be amended still more as need shall arise.

But this is a very different thing from the prevailing conviction that the people of Germany, and particularly the babies of Germany, are starving. That the treaty needs amendment has been cunningly used to present a picture of a Germany first crushed and beaten and then ruthlessly trodden under the heels of her conquerors. It is true enough that a staggering financial burden has been imposed upon Germany, as it ought to be. It is true enough that she is being compelled to make good some small part of the wanton damage that she inflicted upon her victims. She ought to be compelled to make it good to the uttermost farthing and until her iniquity is felt personally by every one of her people. But it is not true that the German people are starving. Beyond a certain shortage of milk there is very little personal suffering, incomparably less than the suffering that is being endured in silence by the people of Belgium, France, Italy, Serbia, and Roumania. All credible reports, many of them from persons of German blood, speak of the people of Germany as having abundance of food and as spending very large sums of money in the rehabilitation of the country, money that ought to be spent in indemnities. By what strange freak of the human mind are we now giving our sympathies to the comparatively slight sufferings of Germany and withholding them from the infinitely greater sufferings that Germany caused throughout the length and breadth of the world?

So far as the German children are concerned, the chief relief of these little ones is actually coming from the very countries that are supposed to be gloating over their sufferings. Many thousands of Austrian children have been sent to Italy, where they have been charitably received by kindly persons whose hereditary animosities are silenced by such distress. Large numbers of German children, train loads of them, are being sent to England, where they are similarly cared for. It seems almost incredible that after all our experiences of German propaganda during the war we should be still so hospitable to deceit as to believe that the people of Germany are suffering physically through the exactions and the vengeance of their former enemies.

Troubles Ahead.

The new administration is fated to meet rough weather as soon as it has crossed the bar. We may as well make up our minds to that. The popular vote was so large that it must necessarily embrace many mutual antagonisms, and all of them hopeful of presidential support. The Republican strength, for example, includes those who follow Hiram Johnson and Borah in their radical assaults on the treaty and the league of nations as well as those who support Lodge and the reservationists in their willingness to accept a league that shall safeguard American interests. There must be some sort of a treaty with Germany, seeing that we are now technically at war with that country, and that treaty must either include or exclude a league of nations. Some one will have to be thrown overboard, and whoever meets that fate may be trusted to make a loud noise at the touch of the cold water.

We need not have much doubt that it will be Johnson and Borah who will thus be consigned to the deep, and as their vocal organs are still in excellent order we may expect a vociferous protest. But Senator Harding will know its exact value. Under no conditions will the people of America withhold their aid from any proper plan to lessen the chances of war. They will not be a party to any wild nonsense tending to the repudiation of national duties assumed by American participation in the war and in the peace. They will make no demand for an unworthy or a selfish isolation. The new President may safely count upon the moral sense of the country, and it will be none the less moral because of its insistence that a league of nations shall be actually a league for peace, and not for war.

There is another fact that the new President will doubtless remember when the puny storm breaks. The great mass of those who voted for him did so, not because he was for or against the league of nations, but because he was definitely against Wilsonism in all its aspects. They were determined to put an end to a system, root and branch, and so long as they are satisfied that this has actually been done they will be well content to accept the substitute without hypercriticism of its exact methods.

Editorial Notes.

The North American Review in the course of an editorial paragraph on the subject of prohibition says: "One expert and authoritative observer recently declared that in New Jersey there were more drunken women and children than ever before. That was because of the home manufacture of beer containing 8 or 9 per cent. of alcohol, instead of the 3 or 4 per cent. formerly produced by breweries. In all large cities there are stores on almost every street, if not on every block, for the sale of hops, malt, and other ingredients and mechanical appliances for the home manufacture of beer, with full directions for their use. * * * In many places the state of affairs is an open scandal, revolting alike to sincere and thoughtful 'wets' and 'drys.' The physical results of such tipping are deplorable. The moral effects, in inculcating contempt for law, are atrocious."

By all means let us celebrate the anniversary of the armistice, but it is just as well that we should do so in chastened mood. Two years ago one might have thought that the millennium had arrived, although the millennium would hardly have been celebrated with quite so much of the cup that cheers and also inebriates. But we know a little better now. At the present time there are nearly twenty nations at war, while the number of revolutions depends a good deal on what we mean by revolution. None the less we have much to be thankful for, even though we are not quite sure what it is.

It is to be hoped that we shall refrain from applying our favorite panacea of legislation to the housing problem. It is all very well to wave a magic wand and say, "Let there be light," but we ought to have learned by this time that light does not necessarily follow the invocation. If builders refrain from building it is not because of "cussedness," but because they find it unprofitable to build, and they find it unprofitable to build because the whole mechanism of supply and demand has been shattered by the war. We might produce an illusionary profit for the builder by fake legislation, such as exempting new houses from taxation, but that would be an experiment that we should have speedily to add to our long list of failures. The plight of those who can not find roofs to cover them is a pitiable one, but there is no real remedy except the adjustments that come automatically, and these seem to have made a good beginning. There is no "philosopher's stone" in government any more than that there is in physics.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Edith Cavell Memorial.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 15, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: During the war you were kind enough to print various letters in regard to the work of California House, and since the war ended you have permitted me to report progress on the establishment of a California House Permanent Memorial Ward in the Edith Cavell Hospital and School for Nurses in Brussels. May I venture to ask you to give me the opportunity to bring my account up to date for the benefit of those among your readers who may not be posted?

The Memorial Ward was opened on the 29th of January, 1920. In the absence of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, M. Paul Hymans, minister of foreign affairs, performed the opening ceremony. In a moving speech he recalled that in the early days of 1915 very little had been undertaken for the employment of wounded and disabled soldiers, and he was kind enough to state that the initiative of this truly pioneer effort at California House had been of an educational importance out of all proportion perhaps to the comparatively limited number of men (upwards of six hundred) it had been possible to train there. The continued association of American generosity with their own attempts at swift rehabilitation would he, he also asserted, the greatest possible encouragement to renewed effort, as it argued an imaginative insight into their heart-breaking problems which would strengthen their purposes, and give them what Europe needed almost as much as actual material help—the assurance of sympathy which is ready to condone inevitable failures and to applaud each and every hard-won success. Permanent memorials had already been established in their hearts and minds which would need no monuments to emphasize them. No Belgian child for generations to come but would bless the name of Herbert Hoover; many other Californians deserved the place they occupied in that splendid roll of spontaneous beneficence, which was in its truest sense a roll of honor. Outside of California, Monsieur Hymans added, it gave him particular pleasure to note that large contributions to the Memorial Ward were due to the energy of one of the best friends Belgium had been fortunate enough to gain during the war—Mrs. Bayard Henry of Philadelphia. No appeal had ever been made to her in vain. The swiftness of her response had only been equaled by the generosity with which the many friends of Belgium in Philadelphia had supported her. In token, therefore, of their deep appreciation of the unremitting efforts of Mrs. Bayard Henry and the generosity of Philadelphia the Belgian members of the committee of the Edith Cavell Hospital had donated a bed in the California House Ward in her honor to the memory of Captain Howard Henry, who had died on active service in 1919. In further acknowledgment of the work done for their wounded and disabled soldiers by California House, and of the Californian generosity which had made it possible, a bed had also been named in honor of the chairman of the executive committee, to whose initiative its foundation as well as that of the Memorial Ward was due.

After the ceremony a procession followed the minister, the American and British ambassadors to the flower-bedecked ward, every bed of which was already occupied.

To spontaneous Belgian cooperation we owe, therefore, two of the twelve beds in our Memorial Ward; the money for another bed has been collected in Great Britain and dedicated to the memory of a British officer as a tribute to the Volunteer Aid Detachment that gave us untiring, unpaid service for nearly four years. So great is the present demand upon the beds that a proposal was to be brought forward, after my visit in September, for a special pavilion to house them.

May I remind your readers that the California House Ward is ultimately to make part of the great international memorial to Edith Cavell, which is to consist of a large hospital and training school for nurses—the realization of her dream. The plans are well forward, and the city of Brussels has presented a magnificent site. As it is unlikely that the contemplated buildings can be completed before three or four years, it is hoped that the California House Pavilion may demonstrate on a small scale the possibilities of the new scheme.

In conclusion may I add that no expenses whatever have been deducted from the funds; every dollar contributed has been used for the purpose for which it was intended.

The twelve beds have been named:

1. En Reconnaissance a Miss Heyneman.
 2. In memory of Van Dyke Fernald, killed in 1918.
 3. In memory of Julian Biddle, killed in 1917.
 4. In memory of the Boys from Ventura County.
 5. In memory of William Dreer, died in 1918.
 6. In memory of Howard Houston Henry, died in 1919.
 7. In memory of Harry Butters, killed in 1916.
 8. In memory of Douglas MacMonigal, killed in 1918.
 9. In memory of James Alan Ackerman, died in 1918.
 10. In memory of John Backhouse, killed in 1918.
 11. Still unnamed.
 12. Still unnamed.

Mayor MacSwiney.

CHICAGO, November 10, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Permit a distant reader of the Argonaut to congratulate your journal and its many readers for your timely article of October 30th on the "Death of Mayor MacSwiney."

The new style of martyrdom could not be better described. The jolly Irishman is an impulsive fellow. He is never quiet at peace or happy unless he is in a fight. The Celtic father who put a blackthorn shillalah in his son's hand when the boy was starting for the fair with instructions to "Hit any head you see" must have sent the same lad to New York, who strutted up Broadway with the brave challenge, "Be-gorra, is there any law in this country? If there is, I'm agin it."

As an adopted citizen he likes our country fairly well as a safe shelter from which to throw stones at England. As a politician he is unrivaled.

It was my experience to witness that most humiliating spectacle in our streets—the July anti-draft riots of 1863. Native citizens assured me they were made up mostly of Irishmen. Their chief "diversion" was in chasing the helpless "dom'd nagurs," beating them with clubs and stones, hanging them to lamp-posts, and burning colored orphan asylums. Colored folk were "Abe Linkum's" habes.

Just after the war, when the weary nation was getting its first breath, the same Irish patriots organized, armed, and led the Freeman invasion of Canada to hit England behind the back from a neutral country.

Only in September of this present year these same disturbers of peace under the name of "Sinn Feiners" broke up a meeting of American citizens who were gathered in Carnegie Hall, New York, to celebrate the tercentenary anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims. Under the guise of a group of self-styled "American women pickets," carrying banners and yelling "Down with England," they forced their way into the building and made the assembly to flee for safety.

If some of these Rioters had been killed by the police in trying to maintain law and order they would probably have been added to the MacSwiney list of martyrs.

Our country is gaining new experience with its immigrants that call for better material at our ports or amended legislation to teach the lawless.

W. H. VAN ANTWERP.

Women at the Polls.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 14, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Your Mr. Coryn tells us that "Mr. G. K. Chesterton once wrote an essay to warn us against the fallacies into which we are likely to be led by our habits of generalization." Using this as a text, Mr. Coryn generalizes profusely in an attempt to demonstrate the fallacies in the generalizations of others.

The sum of his generalizations seems to be that women do not constitute a separate and distinct body of voters, that they are not pacifists, that they are capable rulers, and that they are probably the intellectual superiors of their husbands.

So far as it is humanly possible to tell, he is probably correct in his first conclusion. We can be reasonably certain that women as a class are neither Democrats nor Republicans. However, we can not be at all sure that the increasingly watery type of politician now found in public office is not, to a large extent, the result of woman's influence in politics. At least he is of about the same consistency as the males who seem to find most favor with the women's clubs throughout the country.

It is impossible to demonstrate the incorrectness of Mr. Coryn's second conclusion, but it is safe to say that any one who made note of the number of normally Republican women in this state who voted for Mr. Wilson in 1916 may well doubt the soundness of this generalization.

If the women of today aspired to govern as did Queen Victoria there would be no cause for worry. If we may trust such an authority as Mr. Walter Bagehot, she governed well because she governed little. An investigation of the conduct of some of our public officers recently filled by women might justify a conclusion quite contrary to that reached by Mr. Coryn.

Finally, we must all concede that it is almost impossible to measure human intelligence. However, if the political intelligence of the rank and file of the women who did not take voting instructions from their husbands is to be judged by the public statements of their leaders—let us say in the fight for the community property measure—it is safe to say that the leadership of mere man will not be seriously challenged in this generation.

Yours very truly,

A MALE CITIZEN.

SEVEN YEARS OF DANIELS.

We talk glibly enough of an undivided fleet on the Pacific Coast, and at the back of our uneasy minds is a vision of Japan, at the present moment a little resentful and arrogant and possibly taking stocks of her naval resources and of the great concourse of transports that would be at her disposal in case of need. Of course there is no idea of war with Japan. That must always be said whenever we allow our speculative thoughts to range westward. It is among the conventions that must be observed, and particularly at a time when statesmen are openly referring to such a conflict as "unthinkable," always an ominous word in such a connection. None the less we should like to have the navy on this side of the continent. It would conduce to our more easy slumbers. It would mark a general recognition of the fact that the centre of the world's gravity has been moving toward the setting sun, and that events, to put it mildly, are now more likely to happen in the Pacific than in the Atlantic. And Japan, we may remark irrelevantly, lies on the other side of the Pacific.

But whether the presence of the navy ought to conduce to our more easy slumbers is not, perhaps, as much of a foregone conclusion as we should like to believe. So much depends on what sort of a navy it is. Now all battleships look pretty much alike to the landsman. What does he know, what can he know, beyond the external appearance of leviathan and the glimpses that he may get of her irresistible guns? Everything beyond that is a mystery to him. He knows little or nothing of the hundred and one invisible factors that may make all the difference between defeat and victory. He knows nothing of that mysterious something that is called morale, and when it comes to such technicalities as range-finders or the control of turret guns he can hardly be said to be "all at sea," for that is exactly where he is not. All of which means that the finest appearing navy in the world may present itself to the expert eye as useless for purposes of war. And so let us turn to an article entitled "Seven Years of Daniels" appearing in the current issue of the North American Review. Its author is Archibald Douglas Turnbull, who has a record of eighteen years in the service. During the war he served in command of escort vessels on the coasts of France and England and also on the staff of Admiral Sims at London headquarters. We may reasonably believe that Mr. Turnbull knows what he is talking about and that when he speaks of the strength and efficiency of the navy he is well aware of what strength and efficiency consist.

Perhaps it would be well to glance first at Mr. Turnbull's summary of the present state of the navy that we are so anxious to see on the Pacific Coast. This summary comes at the end of Mr. Turnbull's article, but perhaps it would be useful to give it precedence. Let us visit, he says, any navy yard. We may be impressed by the crowded masts and spars, but then we shall see that the majority of the ships fly no colors and that no soul moves about their decks. They are the "dead shells of once living entities." Those that are in commission are undermanned and woefully inadequate in trained personnel. In the fall of 1919 only two battleships were considered to be fairly fit for service. It is open to question whether the flagship Pennsylvania and her sisters of the Atlantic fleet could do more than undertake short cruises along the coast. The battleships that attended the San Francisco convention were in little better condition. Among all the submarines based upon Newport there are enough trained men for one boat only. Out of a total of three hundred submarines not more than thirty-six have effective crews. Says Mr. Turnbull: "Mr. Daniels found the navy in good material condition, manned by a strong, self-respecting personnel, animated from end to end by a fine spirit and a high purpose. Mr. Daniels, after seven years in office, will leave the navy a battered hulk which it will take years of careful repairing to make seaworthy."

To enter into a diagnosis of the disease called Daniels would require more space than can here be given to it. But Mr. Turnbull does it for us so far as the ordinary limitations of the modern magazine will permit. He confesses that the task has been a difficult one because the malady is so deep-rooted. Mr. Daniels had his own way for seven years, and although there were rumors and a whole series of disquieting facts it was by no means easy to disturb the popular apathy. To say that the navy was in a bad way was to run counter to one of the most invincible of American superstitions that "holds everything American as superlative and therefore unassailable." A combination of circumstances allowed Mr. Daniels to have his own way in everything, and although he was wholly and utterly ignorant of the navy and of everything pertaining to it, there was one thing of which he was not ignorant, and that was politics. And politics, to Mr. Daniels, meant votes.

At once the navy became a mechanism through which and by which the politician might secure votes. To the eye of Daniels it had no other function whatsoever. It was to be apportioned, regulated, and controlled with a view to the utmost possible product of votes. Now the navy consisted of officers and men, and Mr. Daniels proceeded to count them with an eye to the ballot-box and the sacred principles of true democracy, intent only upon the number of heads and sublimely indifferent to their contents. The officers, being in a minority, were obviously negligible and might be insulted with impunity, but the men, being numerous, should be courted and flattered. So Mr. Daniels visited a battleship, intent on the new electioneering. Waving away the official quarterdeck inspection, he hurried to the fore-castle and called a meeting of the crew. "Boys," he said in effect, "I've come to tell you that I'm going to run the navy for you. There won't be any more of this oppression by the officers. Whenever you think that you aren't getting a square deal, just write and tell me all about it. Never mind about any red tape either—just come straight to me. I'm your best friend and I know you're mine." Mr. Turnbull says:

That the head of the navy should make an announcement so entirely at variance with the regulations of any military or naval organization was a staggering blow to the ship's company. It was perfectly well known that any one with a grievance, real or fancied, could at any time report it through the proper channels and ask for redress. But to write to the Secretary, or the Department, without reference to one's commanding officer, even if heard of, was universally condemned, forward and aft. It is reported, in this case, that after the departure of the Secretary the captain, in his turn, addressed the assembled ship's company. It is unlikely that he had occasion to mount a mess-bench, but it is certain that he spoke with that picturesqueness and force of language for which he is not without his reputation. He intimated that no such practice as had just been suggested would be followed on that ship—at least during his incumbency of the captain's cabin.

Unfortunately, the first seeds of discontent and sedition had been sown, the first "white mice" in the navy had been born.

The education of the sailor man was another fetish of Mr. Daniels. Now the sailor man was already being educated whenever he wished it. His officers were always ready to help him, and it was so understood. But this was not enough for Mr. Daniels. There must be a schoolroom on every ship and the duties of the ship must be regulated accordingly. Scholarship must come first and seamanship after:

When rifles, machine guns, and even ships' five-inch batteries had been firing for several days into Vera Cruz; when nineteen lives had paid for the Administration's flat refusal to allow the admiral commanding to conduct a really military operation; when, due to the withdrawal of our ships from Tampico at the Secretary's, not Admiral Mayo's order, it became necessary to hoist the British ensign on an American yacht to protect American refugees from the fire of Mexican batteries ashore; when all these activities were absorbing the interest of most of the navy in the Atlantic, many messages were received from Washington. Almost the last of these, when decoded, read: "School and similar exercises may be temporarily suspended."

Mr. Turnbull's arraignment is condensed, but precise. It came to be understood throughout the navy that merit was nothing and that pull was everything. The old-timers naturally failed to reenlist. Why should they? They were sailors, and not politicians, and so they stood no chance under the new régime. Then another evil made its appearance, and of this Mr. Turnbull may tell in his own words. He says:

At naval prisons, such as that at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, men duly found guilty by court-martial of serious offenses are confined for varying terms. It was to this class that Mr. Daniels early in his term turned his attention. Very shortly these men began to reappear in the service, and aboard ships, when they had completed only small fractions of their sentences. Protests came at once from many commanding officers. As usual, these availed nothing. It is a matter of written record in the department that not only were thieves lightly sent back to duty, but that men sentenced to long terms for unspeakable crimes against society were released among decent bluejackets. Recent attempts to investigate these matters have been defeated, largely by spiriting away witnesses, but the fact remains. The effect upon the navy was not long ago brought out by Captain Joseph Taussig. This officer will be remembered as the commander of the first American destroyer division to reach British waters in 1917, and as replying to the question of probable readiness for duty off the Irish coast with the remark: "We're ready now!" Captain Taussig was not allowed the court of inquiry which he requested, but he has had the satisfaction of indignantly refusing a "good job for keeping his mouth shut."

The beginning of the war did not mean the dethronement of politics. The need for efficiency was now of the most pressing kind, but it was nearly impossible to secure it at the eleventh hour. It is doubtful, says the author, if a single five-cent piece was ever spent for men, ships, munitions, or any other preparation against possible war at the instigation of Mr. Daniels:

Consequently the enormous work which became inevitable in the first months of 1917 was hurriedly and imperfectly got under way. Immense sums were spent where smaller amounts, applied earlier, would have sufficed. And in the addition of great numbers of temporary officers many mistakes were made, much injustice was done. So far as the Secretary was interested, his anxiety appears to have been directed toward providing for all the young men whose chief professional qualification was the right political view. He took just as good care of those among the countless hundreds enlisting whose names were presented to him by members of Congress or other vote-producers. Thus fine duty and motion were made easy for reserve stay-at-homes while on active service abroad, having only the recommendation of their commanding officers, could safely be disre-

Taking into consideration the amount of major and minor politics involved in the formation of the Reserve, the splendid record made by that body, a record ungrudgingly acclaimed by the regular service, is nothing less than extraordinary.

There is a widespread current of feeling in the country that Mr. Daniels, through the general performance of his department during the war, has redeemed himself. It should be distinctly understood that no credit whatever is really due to the Secretary. Whatever of honor and distinction belongs to the navy is the navy's own. Practically every military step was taken only after a hard-fought battle between "win the war" and "get the votes."

Mr. Turnbull's article ought to be read in its entirety, no matter how intense the resentment it may occasion. It may somewhat dilute the sense of tranquillity we feel at the sight of an imposing array of battleships, but that will be a comparatively small price to pay for a realization that may bring rectification and amendment in its train. And to that end we may repeat Mr. Turnbull's concluding words, already cited, and to the effect that "Mr. Daniels, after seven years in office, will leave the navy a battered hulk which it will take years of careful repairing to make seaworthy."

SIDNEY CORYN.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 17, 1920.

Proof of the extraordinary dexterity of William Kingston, who was born without arms, is given by a medical expert who visited the English farmer and then wrote: "Kingston highly entertained us at breakfast by putting his half-naked feet upon the table and carrying his tea and toast between his great and second toe to his mouth with as much facility as if his foot had been a hand and his toes fingers. I then put a sheet of paper upon the floor and handed Kingston a pen, which he grasped between the toes of his right foot and wrote three lines as well as most ordinary writers. In fact, as he told me, he writes all his bills and attends to all his own correspondence. He then showed me how he shaves himself with his razor in his toes and how he can comb his own hair, as well as dressing and undressing himself—with the exception of buttoning his clothes. He is a farmer by occupation and milks his own cows with his toes, cuts his own hay, binds it up in bundles, and carries it about the field for his cattle. Last winter he constantly supplied eight heifers with fodder and last summer he made all his own hayricks. He can do all the business connected with a hay field—except mowing—as fast and as well with his feet as others can with rakes and forks. He goes out and catches his own horse, saddling and bridling him with his teeth and toes, and he is so strong in his teeth that he can lift ten pecks of beans by them and can throw a sledge-hammer as far with his feet as other men can with their hands. He began with a single hen and her flock of chickens. With the profit on these he bought a ewe, then a colt and a sheep. Now he occupies and completely runs a small farm."

Heligoland, the German fortress in the North Sea, is fast disappearing, and the Heligoland of 1890, the year in which Great Britain exchanged the island for rights on the East African coast, is reappearing. The change has been brought about by the inter-allied naval and military mission, which under the peace treaty is charged with the demolition of the military and naval works on the island. During the twenty-eight years the Germans were in possession they fortified it at a cost of $175,000,000. Artificial cliffs were constructed and the area of the island was increased by dredging the Elbe (at the mouth of which it stands) and depositing the material on Heligoland. Great gun emplacements were constructed, harbors were made for war craft, and later airship sheds were built. Now they have all gone. The great twelve-inch guns have been cut up into sections like round cheese, the emplacements destroyed by pick and powder, and the harbor works and the aircraft stations are being dismantled, and it is all being done by German labor under the superintendence of Allied officers.

A Swedish inventor has devised a most unique system of electrical heating for houses of from four to ten rooms, and which is especially intended for localities where electric current is inexpensive. The system consists of two tanks, a motor-driven rotary pump, and the necessary radiators and piping. One of the tanks is placed in the attic of the house and is thermally insulated. In it are placed the heating units, which, normally, are only operated at night, when the rates for electric current are low. In the morning the heating units are disconnected from the supply circuit and the motor-driven pump started. The water flows down the piping and through the radiators by the force of gravity and is collected in a receiving tank in the basement, from where it is pumped and returned to the tank in the attic. It is claimed that the cost of heating a house by this system is about 12 cents per room, with a current rate of 1 cent a kilowatt hour.

Japan trebled its output of coal between 1901 and 1917, producing 29,000,000 tons in the latter year. In 1917 there were 187,000 Japanese underground coal workers.

A marine grass found extensively in Japanese waters yields a fibre which, when mixed with cotton, both strengthens and cheapens thread, usually made of the latter alone.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Sam P. Coles, "King of the Newsboys," of London, has been married to Miss Adèle Victoria Robertson, who won many medals for service in the Canadian Red Cross during the war.

Mme. Millerand, wife of the new French president, Alexandre Millerand, is entering into the social and political life of the capital with great interest. She is a charming woman and her influence for good is widely felt.

Hugh Jennings, who resigned as manager of the Detroit baseball team after fourteen years' service, will take up the practice of law, a profession which has engaged his attention during the baseball off-season since his graduation from Cornell University.

Henry Kitchell Webster, who is with the Barnum-Bailey-Ringling Brothers circus, "seeing what he can see" of life under the big tent, says that he is not gathering material for a three-ringed novel, but merely satisfying a boyhood longing to steep himself in the atmosphere of sawdust and tanbark.

Miss Jane Morton, member of one of Chicago's most prominent families, is reported to be ready to forsake horseback riding, golf, tennis, and society to become a stenographer. She is said to have started work at a broker's office on La Salle Street, where she is learning to master business correspondence.

Gertrude Atherton has instituted a new social custom at the Goldwyn studios—that of serving tea in her office there after the day's work. Among the literati who gather around the samovar on Mrs. Atherton's desk are Clayton Hamilton, Rupert Hughes, Gouverneur Morris, and Charles Kenyon, all of whom keep their typewriters humming until after 5 o'clock in the interests of the "shiftin' pictures."

Jabotinsky, the Russian revolutionary Jew, who went to Palestine, organized the military body known as "The Jewish Legion," became implicated in the Easter riots at Jerusalem, was heavily sentenced by the British authorities and immediately released on the arrival of Sir Stuart Samuel, the Jewish governor of Palestine, is reported to be planning to visit the United States. He has sent his thanks to "the American press" for its sympathy with him during his brief imprisonment.

Mme. Marguerita Sylva, one of the principal figures in the operatic world today, is devoting her time toward the promotion of opera in the United States. Her self-imposed task is the formation of an opera house in every city in the country with a population of 100,000 or over. To Mme. Sylva, who has sung in nearly every opera house on the continent of Europe, the absence of companies or other mediums through which the opera can be brought before the public throughout the United States has been depressing.

Mary Young, the latest Broadway star, began on the stage as a child playing Puck in Augustin Daly's production of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Her success was such that Mr. Daly supervised her education in England, with special reference to a career upon the dramatic stage. In this period she made occasional appearances in the productions of Mr. Daly at his London Daly's Theatre. When she returned to America Miss Young played the lead in "A Circus Girl" opposite James T. Powers. With the Craig Players Miss Young created all of the leading feminine rôles in the Craig Harvard prize plays.

J. Piastro-Borisoff, Russian violinist, is to make his first appearance in this country in the near future. Borisoff's first teacher was his father. In 1901 he became a pupil of Pablo Sarasate. Still later, at the Conservatory of Petrograd, he studied with Leopold Auer. In addition to his musical studies he became a student of landscape painting. Upon his graduation from the conservatory the young violinist received a gold medal as honor student of Auer's class and, as an especial distinction, a famous old Italian violin, called Gobette, the gift of the Princess Helen Altenburg, president of the Russian Musical Society. His diploma accorded him the honor of "free artist laureate" of the conservatory.

Matthias Erzberger, writer and journalist, first came into prominence as leader of the German Catholic party, specializing in the Reichstag on financial legislation. Starting on the lowest rung of the political ladder, he climbed it through his knowledge of involved economics and by aid of his correspondence bureau. He headed the German armistice delegation. Up to the third year of the war, when he introduced his famous peace resolution in the Reichstag, he posed as a Pan-German and the fall of the Bethmann-Hollweg ministry was attributed to him. Son of a village tailor who owed his education to a rich man, Erzberger as vice-premier and minister of finance remained subservient to the great business interests of Germany which compelled Emperor William to abdicate. After the peace terms were made known the pact was called the "Erzberger Peace" and he was the worst hated man in Germany.

Jacques Pintel, pianist, was born in Odessa of French parents. At fifteen he entered the Paris Conservatoire by competition. Here young Pintel studied principally under Charles de Beriot, a pupil of Mendelssohn. In 1900 Mr. Pintel carried off the "Premier Prix" at the Conservatoire, after which he entered upon his virtuoso career in Paris, touring all of France and subsequently visiting England, where he remained until he began his tour, which included successes in the principal cities of China, Australia, New Zealand, Burmah, and India. Besides this tour, Pintel gave many concerts in London with the London Symphony Orchestra, Queen's Hall and Albert Hall. In Paris he appeared with the orchestra of Edouard Colonne and in numerous recitals.

Metchnikoff wrote long on how to live 100 years, and then died before he was seventy. "Uncle" John Daubney never thought much about how to live, but spent his time "workin' and livin'." And on October 6th Uncle John celebrated his 101st birthday at his home in Taylors Falls, Minnesota, in the beautiful valley of the St. Croix, where he started logging in the wilderness seventy-five years ago. Dean of all the pioneers in Minnesota, he's the last of the "Forty-Niners" and the only surviving member of the Old Settlers' Association.

OLD FAVORITES.

Spring and Winter.

Was it well in him, if he Felt not love, to speak of love so?
If he still unmoved must be,
Was it nobly sought to move so?
Pluck the flower, but not to wear it—
Spurn it from him, yet not spare it?

Need he say that I was fair,
With such meaning in his tone,
Adding ever that her hair
Had the same tinge as my own?
Pluck my life up, root and bloom,
To make garlands for her tomb!

And, her cheek, he said, tho' bright,
Lack'd the lucid blush divine
Of that rose each whisper light
Of his praises waked in mine;
But 'twas just that he loved then
More than he can love again.

Then, if beauty could not bind him,
Wherefore praise me, speaking low?
Use my face just to remind him
How no face could please him now?
Why, if loving could not move him,
Did he teach me still to love him?

"Yes!" he said, "he had grown wise now:
He had suffer'd much of yore:
But a fair face, to his eyes now,
Was a fair face, and no more.
Yet the anguish and the bliss,
And the dream, too, had been his."

Ah, those words a thought too tender
For the commonplaces spoken!
Looks whose meaning seem'd to render
Help to words when speech came broken!
Why so late in July moonlight
Just to say what's said by moonlight?

And why praise my youth for gladness,
Keeping something in his smile
That changed all my youth to sadness,
He still smiling all the while?
Since, when so my youth was over,
He said, "Seek some younger lover!"

Well, the Spring's back now! the thrushes
Are astir as heretofore,
And the apple-blossom blushes
As of old about the door.
Doth he taste a finer bliss,
I must wonder, in all this,

(Winning thus what I have lost)
By the usage of my youth?
I can feel my forehead crost
By the wrinkle's fretful tooth,
While the gray grows in my hair,
And the cold creeps everywhere.—Lord Lytton.

The Wisdom of Brynhild.

Be wise, and cherish thine hope in the freshness of the days,
And scatter its seed from thine hand in the field of the people's praise:
Then fair shall it fall in the furrow, and some the earth shall speed,
And the sons of men shall marvel at the blossom of the deed:
But some the earth shall speed not: nay rather, the wind of the heaven
Shall waft it away from thy longing—and a gift to the Gods hast thou given,
And a tree for the roof and the wall in the bouse of the hope that shall be,
Though it seemeth our very sorrow, and the grief of thee and me.

When thou hearest the fool rejoicing, and he saith, "It is over and past,
And the wrong was better than right, and hate turns into love at the last,
And we strove for nothing at all, and the Gods are fallen asleep;
For so good is the world a-growing that the evil good shall reap,"
Then loosen thy sword in the scabbard and settle the helm on thine head,
For men betrayed are mighty, and great are the wrongfully dead.
Wilt thou do the deed and repent it? thou badst better never been horn:
Wilt thou do the deed and exalt it? then thy fame shall be outworn:
Thou shalt do the deed and abide it, and sit on thy throne on high,
And look on today and tomorrow as those that never die.
—William Morris.

The American speed record for a naval destroyer was made by the Satterlee in a standardization trial over a measured course off Rockland, Maine. She made a mile at the rate of 38.26 knots an hour.

AN ENGLISH WIFE IN BERLIN.

The Princess Blücher Relates Her German Experiences During the War.

The diary of the Princess Blücher, of which a partial survey appeared last week in these columns, extends from the declaration of war to the armistice. The princess, it will be remembered, is an Englishwoman forced by the exigencies of war to leave England with her German husband. In common with a few other ladies similarly situated she took up her residence in Berlin, where she remained without any serious annoyance throughout the war and witnessed most of the events that took place in the German capital. She seems even to have participated in intimate political conversations and to have been allowed some freedom of action in communicating with her friends and in the relief of British prisoners. Writing under date of January, 1917, we find the princess commenting on the status of the emperor and the place that he occupied in the public mind. She says:

I think people in England hardly realize the covert scorn with which people speak of him here. The remarks made often astonish me. "Let him talk as if he had won these victories, and let him believe he is running the whole army." "Send him to the East when there are some prisoners to march past, and he will be pleased; and again to the West when there is a little success to show him, and he will be as pleased as ever." Whilst the emperor himself complains sadly in the same words: "I never know what I am going to do from one day to another," he says. "Today I am packed up and sent off to the East, and tomorrow to the West."

The author tells us that the emperor is in some degree a tyrant and can not always be depended on to keep his promises. He has also certain qualities of the bully, and yet with all these drawbacks he has a great charm of manner and his real friendships are genuine and lasting:

As for the emperor's six sons, there are many malicious remarks and criticisms rife amongst the people; and all the touching anecdotes of the sacrifice of the empress in sending six sons to the front, where other mothers had only one to offer, have long disappeared from the papers. The monster of war has always had a way of passing over the six princes, and preferred the only son of a widow. People are beginning to murmur that they are being too carefully guarded; and granted that they did run into danger at the beginning of the war, they always seem to be now more or less on the staff—and, funny as it may seem, a great many people seem to take it specially amiss that one or other of them is always getting married. "The fact of the matter is," said one of the ministers in a very high position here not long ago, "one of the Kaiser's sons ought to be sacrificed—to appease the people."

We are told a good deal about the shortage of food and clothing. Officialism interfered with everything, and the path of the shopper was a thorny one:

A friend of mine wanted to buy some woolen underwear, and her experiences are typical of war-shopping now in Germany. She saw what she wanted in a shop and went in. The girl who attended her was very obliging and got everything ready, but when the bill was made out she turned to my friend and said, "Where is your 'Bezugschein' (permit of purchase)?" "Oh," said my friend, "I have none." The girl told her it was a trifle, and that she would reserve the goods for her until she obtained one; she need only go to the police station. Off went my friend, and when she arrived at the police station they told her to go to a stationer's, and get a form which is filled in as a kind of control when one moves about. So she departed and returned with this form. "What shall I write on it?" she asked. The answer was, your name, your age, where you were born, what subject you are, and last, but not least—not how much material do you want, but what faith do you profess? My friend filled in all this, whereupon the official stamped her paper, which meant that he guaranteed for the truth thereof, and then sent her off to the place where she might receive the permit. This was a good walk from where she was, and she decided to go next day. When she got there at 4 o'clock in the afternoon she was told the office was only open from 8 to 1 o'clock. Patient she trudged home, to start again next day. When she arrived this time she was asked what the permit was to be for. "For three pairs of combinations," she told the official (there are no discreet secrets from officials here in war-time). "What!" he exclaimed, "you want three pairs? You can not have more than two, one to wear while the other is in the wash!" Shopping becomes a strange thing when controlled by Prussian officialdom.

The author speaks severely of Mr. Gerard. He was a man, she says, of disagreeable, tactless manners, and he offended every one by his breaches of good manners.

References to the unpopularity of the emperor become increasingly numerous as the diary proceeds. In January, 1918, we are told:

The feeling towards the Kaiser is steadily diminishing in loyalty and respect, and the same people who greeted him so warmly a short time ago with "Ave, Cæsar!" are now distributing leaflets in the back streets of Berlin proclaiming, "Down with the Kaiser, Down with the Government," and the police, when called upon to suppress the evil-doers, refuse to act, and are more than suspected of being behind the movement themselves.

The princess makes many references to American intervention, which at first was considered to be ridiculous, but of which the gravity could not for long be concealed. In July, 1918, she writes:

Another discussion touched on the extraordinary way in which Germany has always underrated the importance of the danger coming from America, almost the whole country making fun of and laughing at the idea of an American army. Some one who happened to be present with his majesty at the time when Roumania declared war, and also when the news of the American declaration became known, assured us that on the first occasion the Kaiser came into the room trembling and white as a sheet, his knees shaking as he said, "All is over; I may as well abdicate at once"; whereas on the second occasion he and those round him were jaunty, laughing, and saying that it made no matter at all, as America could never get an army together, and if it did, they were much too far away and could never possibly get their troops over because of the submarines.

I wonder why they did not listen to the few wise people who perceived the danger of the American intervention in all its sinister meaning, as it is now proving to be the final undoing of Germany.

In August, 1918, the author tells us that news of German reverses was steadily coming in. The people gradually learned that the constant "shortening of the front" meant retreat. Moreover, there was evidently a loss of morale and loyalty in the army itself:

Ludendorff has publicly acknowledged the failure of the great offensive; it seems the growing lack of ammunition is the ominous cause of the defeat. So many guns have been left in the hands of the enemy, and there is not enough iron left to make new ones.

There have been public protests against the misleading statements made by Prince Heinrich as to the results of the Marne battle, on the same day that Ludendorff had admitted that their strategic plan had failed. He naively seems to have thought that the opinion of some unknown Turkish attaché, that the Marne battle was a German victory, was of more importance than the confession of the great generals. It is so incredibly foolish to try and hoodwink the people like this, when the truth must ultimately leak out.

The Bavarians have a special complaint that the war reports are always partial to the Prussians. They say that as long as the losses of life and material are sustained by the Crown Prince's army, no mention is ever made of them; but as soon as Prince Rupprecht's army is being beaten, every detail of the defeat is made public, and an open confession is made of the enemy having penetrated the German lines.

It seems impossible now for Ludendorff to force any decisive successful battle this year. Officers here say that his plan of separating the British army from the French was not impossible and would have been successful, if the heavy losses of the Allies had not been so speedily made up again. In a single month 355,000 men were thrown across, and every gun had been replaced.

It is apparently the unity of command which restored the Allied fortunes, and if the American troops go on coming over at the rate of 300,000 a month, the American army alone will soon be as big as the German.

We are told something of the memoirs of Dr. Davis, the emperor's American dentist, and the painful impression made in Berlin by what seemed to be a grave breach of confidence:

The tables were filled with different members of the Herrenhaus, and as all the numerous political grievances of the day were being eagerly discussed, it was interesting enough to listen to them. The articles by Dr. Davis, the Kaiser's American dentist, were the chief topic in the English papers. We all feel that it is not quite square to publish these little private sayings, uttered in confidence in an idle moment, and which take on such a different coloring when seen in the glare of the hostile searchlights of peoples at war. They are significant, however, of the mental calibre of Davis, whose "Memoirs" would have no interest but for this royal gossip. The courtiers here are quite right for once—"If he will make a confidant of a dentist, what else can you expect?"

On my remarking to my neighbor at dinner that I imagined the "Memoirs" were very much exaggerated he laughed and said, "Oh, not in the least; the emperor has often boasted of the home-truths he had been telling his dentist." I asked him what the emperor must think of it now. "Oh," was the reply, "we take good care that he does not see the English papers while there are such things in them."

In September, 1918, the bad news from the front had become unmistakable. The Hindenburg line had been broken and Bulgaria was moving toward a separate peace. A few days later we are told of the terrible state of gloom and depression in Berlin as the breakdown became more and more imminent:

Ludendorff has had a nervous breakdown. The army is practically in a state of mutiny, and one whole division is said to have already surrendered. The soldiers, they say, are already turning on their officers and throwing hand grenades at them, and a train full of officers returning from leave back to the front was stopped, and they were all forced to get out and return home. At the same time one heard of innumerable soldiers writing home indignant at the proposition of an armistice, and saying they will not hear of one on the terms proposed by the Entente.

The population of the Rhine provinces are shuddering at the idea of the huge German army settling down to winter quarters in their land, as they say there is no more discipline left. I even heard of people in Frankfurt being privately advised to leave, as it has been whispered the enemy might possibly be there in a fortnight.

In any case, exaggerated as these reports may be, the universal demoralization of the people is very great, and one has sometimes the impression of a flock of sheep who have lost their leader and are going about in a dazed sort of manner, looking about for a loophole of escape from the impending evil.

The emperor, we are told, never knew the strength of the American army. Ludendorff hid everything from him. The German offensive was wholly the work of Ludendorff and it was strongly opposed by Hindenburg and by Prince Rupprecht:

At the same time the poor soldiers declare that it is not so much the overpowering number of the American troops which has turned the tide, as the fact that there is no more rubber left to make gas-masks, and that they can not face the gas without them; and then the terrible English tanks. The poor fellows shudder at the very name of them. They say they were prepared for ten or twenty, but during the last few weeks they have been advancing in columns of hundreds. Even the German officers admit that this form of weapon is the first military invention which has proved too much for the genius of German militarism.

The emperor implicitly believed everything that was told by the military chiefs. He never even heard of great German defeats, but every small German success seemed to him to mean a German triumph. In October, 1918, we are told:

Gehard heard from the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, whom he met in the Herrenhaus, that the emperor does not mean to abdicate unless he is forced to. He was so terribly cut up by the bad news from the front that he collapsed and retired to bed for three days; but as soon as he received the news of some local success he quite cheered up again, and became as sanguine and hopeful as ever. This change of mood is typical of the Kaiser and all his entourage; they are entirely swayed by the news which is dished up to them by Ludendorff, and seem incapable of forming an independent opinion of their own, otherwise things could never have come to such a pass. If the Kaiser had really investigated all the information of the last twelve months, and, above all, listened to the pessimists, he would not have been so surprised by the turn things have taken now.

The attacks upon the emperor increased in violence as the full measure of the German defeat dawned upon the people. Indeed there was something repulsive in the venom with which his former adulators turned upon him:

We continue hearing such ceaseless abuse and criticism of Kaiser Wilhelm that I sometimes feel like blushing with shame at people who have always professed such loyalty to their sovereign, and now that the reins of government are slowly falling from his hands turn round and openly rend him. Just those who were amongst the most cringing of his satellites are the most ferocious in their attacks on him, and do not hesitate to denounce him publicly at luncheons and dinners. Many of them he has really made, and these are the worst.

The deplorable part of it is that, whilst condemning them, I have to ask myself whether these people may not be right; and if he really is false. People who know him best, and who try to do justice to his character, say little more than that he is a man of very able parts, possessing a wonderful memory and an unusual capacity for comprehending technical questions of engineering, architecture, etc.

The danger of actual revolution in Germany seems to have been greater than was realized here. The author speaks of the mobs that overran the streets of Berlin, the attacks upon officers, and the general violence that was the order of the day:

Every moment groups of people collected in front of our window, gesticulating and shouting frantically; and to our private dismay, in one wagon-load passing by we distinguished French and Russian prisoners amongst the Germans, all waving the red flag, their faces glowing with delight at the unwanted freedom. We were not a little alarmed, for we knew that if the Germans begin fraternizing with the prisoners and liberating them, we may at any moment have a dangerous rabble of some two million Russians let loose on us, who in their underfed condition would stop short at nothing. The strangest and most disagreeable feeling of all was that nobody knew definitely what was happening and what was the meaning of it all. Every one seemed to be steering for Unter den Linden and Pariser Platz, and as the afternoon wore on we heard that an attack was being made on the royal castle. The great Brandenburger Thor was soon covered with climbers who succeeded in hoisting the red flag on it, and in front of the Adlon Hotel machine guns were placed, and the mob went in, forcing the officers there to tear off their badges. The revolutionists robbed the soldiers of their arms, and strutted about with them to the constant danger of the passers-by.

In her last pages the princess gives us a concluding glimpse of the emperor after his flight to Amerongen. Writing in February, 1919, she says that she had been visited by a friend who had come straight from Amerongen, where he had spent two hours with the emperor:

After having remained talking with the empress for about fifteen minutes he was taken down to the gallery in which the emperor takes his exercise daily, and there he walked with him for two hours. He told us the first sight of him was a great shock. The emperor has grown a long white beard; he brushes his now quite white hair straight back, and his complexion is sallow and unhealthy; but he bore himself with great dignity and spoke quickly and with reserve.

He said that he had felt from the beginning of his reign that the military powers were too strong for him. He had tried from the moment he came to the throne to assert his own authority, but he was too young and perhaps too impulsive. Later on he found that he was powerless in their hands, though he was always trying to break loose and work out his own ideas for his country.

He said that he had enough English blood in his veins to know that the only thing was to go in with England, but he was always talked over by his military authorities and diplomats. Military authorities and diplomats of all countries are responsible for the war, not crowned heads. He will not own or realize that Germany did wrong in her invasion of Belgium. He says that he has proofs that if Germany had not done it England meant to; and that England had made a secret treaty with the Belgian king at the time Lord Haldane was in office, to the effect that they would be permitted to attack Germany through Belgium if necessary.

He would not blame any of his generals by name. He says he knows what marvels they have done for him throughout the war in defending Germany against the whole world. It is only where they began mixing themselves up with the political side that they made the blunders. The only man he blames personally by name is Prince Max of Baden, who, he says, deceived him from the moment he became Reichskanzler by telling him all was going well, and all the time allowing the scheme for his abdication to be worked out behind his back. In fact his abdication was public before he had actually signed it.

He complained most bitterly that he was deceived and lied to from the outset of his reign, and especially throughout the war. His ministers never told him the truth, his military authorities never let him know how things really were, and the naval authorities quoted and stated absolutely fabricated figures.

I did not give my opinion, but I can not help thinking that if a man is an emperor one of his chief aims should be to employ every person and every method by which he can arrive at the truth.

The Kaiser says he was treated as a nonentity by his general staff; that they made a point of contradicting every order or command that he gave; that he was turned out of the room whenever the telephone rang at headquarters, so as not to hear the commands and the real facts. He was never allowed to speak more than a few minutes alone with any one who was likely to give him the truth of what was going on. He was never told the true state of affairs at the front nor the strategy of his generals.

He was hustled backwards or forwards from the eastern to the western headquarters, so as to keep him "out of the way" when his generals were especially occupied.

My informant also told me that the Kaiser deeply regretted the death of Miss Cavell and that the order for the execution had been given by a drunken general who was personally vindictive towards England. The emperor gave an order then that no woman was to be executed without his sanction.

Here we must leave this unusually interesting volume of memoirs, perhaps the only volume of its kind that throws so much light upon the internal state of Germany during the war.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

The San Francisco Clearing House Association reported clearings for the five-day week ended Saturday at $150,700,000, compared with $153,400,000 for the corresponding short week of last year. Saturday's clearings were $30,200,000.

Total gold reserves of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco were greater by $9,804,000 on November 12th than on November 5th, according to the weekly combined statement issued on Saturday.

Total bills on hand fell $13,435,000 and total earning assets the same amount.

A good many citizens have the notion that the transportation law enacted by Congress early this year guarantees a minimum return be satisfied, even if some individual roads make nothing at all. If the earnings on the combined railroad property of the region are under 6 per cent. it becomes the duty of the commission to readjust the rates.

The Santa Fe system lies in the central and western regions, and its property, therefore, is valued in two regions for rate-making purposes. Some of the Santa Fe's neighbors made money prior to Federal control and some of them lost. That situation may continue to obtain under the new law. While earnings for no road are guaranteed, the machinery of the law is supposed to work in such a manner that railroad credit will be improved, which will help the railroad industry generally, and give the public assurance of better service.

The government, having taken the railroads and used them for its own purposes for twenty-six months, did, after it got through with them and returned them to their owners, guarantee earnings for half a year, to allow time for investigation of rates; but that period expired the last of August. The railroads now depend wholly on what they can earn on the rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The logic of the railway situation, in the opinion of many financial authorities, unmistakably points toward such consolidations of interstate lines as are permitted under the new Railroad Act. The committee on railroad securities of the Investment Bankers' Association recently made a definite statement to this effect, adding: "While in the judgment of the committee the law has wisely made such consolidations permissive rather than compulsory, sound business judgment will perceive the business opportunities and can be relied upon to bring about this logical solution of many of the problems involved." After quoting this, a writer on the New York Evening Post's financial page comments as follows:

"While the new law makes consolidations voluntary instead of compulsory, it is stated plainly that competition must be maintained in all events. This would indicate that the Interstate Commerce Commission was authorized by Congress to approve the purchase, say, by the New York Central or the Pennsylvania, of connecting lines or an extension of present lines, but that the New York Central and Pennsylvania systems must continue to compete. In the South, the Illinois Central and the Atlantic Coast Line could follow out similar policies. In the West, Atchison, Northern Pacific, Union Pacific, or Rock Island could extend their lines.

"But there are two reasons why recent Wall Street rumors have probably overestimated immediate developments in the merging of railroads. In the first place, necessary financing at the present time would be difficult. Next, there is a question as to whether large companies like the Pennsylvania or New York Central will care greatly to increase their systems."

It appears logical to assume that the far-sighted investor should rearrange his securities holdings to harmonize with the readjustment which is now under way in industrial and economic life (says the A. W. Coates market bulletin).

The last few years have seen abnormal conditions affecting every industry and enterprise. The very word "abnormal" indicates something which can not continue to exist. Some forms of industrial life have been able to prosper enormously at the expense of other forms. As a result, the securities of companies engaged in the favored industries reached price levels radically higher than any one can expect to be maintained, while, on the other hand, securities of those companies engaged in the favored industries reached low levels down to which we can not expect them to be held as the country returns toward pre-war conditions.

Broadly speaking, those industries engaged in the manufacture and marketing of commodities were the ones which were particularly favored during the last few years, while those corporations whose business consisted of rendering service, rather than the manufacture and sale of things, were adversely affected, their principal hardship coming through the prices which they were obligated to pay for necessary commodities, and the high wage scales enforced upon them by the necessity of competing in the labor market with the producers of commodities.

As commodity and labor prices decline, the corporation which sells service rather than things will find its position and earnings steadily improving. Such companies are those which furnish transportation of people and commodities, and those which furnish electrical communication, power and light—in other words, railways, street railways, and other public utilities.

Industrial corporations, those producing commodities—naturally feel the readjustment before those corporations rendering service feel it. The prices of the securities of many such concerns have discounted the readjustment to a large extent, but as to whether this readjustment has been complete or not will depend upon the extent to which the individual company is or is not loaded up with inventories of high-priced goods which must be sold at declining commodity prices, and upon the strength of its working capital, exclusive of such inventories. Naturally those concerns whose shelves are approximately clean and have converted their inventories of high-priced material into working capital, are those in the best position. Their securities are apparently in line for purchase to hold for "the long pull."

On the other hand, railways and public utilities have apparently just started on their readjustment and upward price tendency, but this movement will hardly attain full swing until the market has recovered from the effects of the downward readjustment of industrials. Before long, according to the opinion of some of the most authoritative analysts in America, the average price of rails and public utilities, which has for some years held an abnormal level below the average price of industrials, will have risen to a level with the industrials, and then will keep on ascending until its normal point well above the average price level of industrials shall have been reached.

This normal and inexorable price level shifting apparently offers splendid opportunities for the wide-awake investor whose purchases of industrial securities during the last few months have not been as profitable as he might have hoped.

While there is no doubt that this country eventually is due for great industrial prosperity, there promises to be an interim of quite a number of months when industrials, generally speaking, will be rather stagnant, but public utilities and rails will be moving steadily upward in price. Foresight, therefore, suggests that the holder of those industrial issues which appear to be in line for a dull period of more or less extent should simply switch over from industrials into the stocks which promise a brisk upward price tendency, stay with them until good profits become available, then take profits and repurchase favored industrials, probably at about the same prices prevailing as at the time he made his switch. When one is attempting to reach a certain objective, either in travel or in finance, it can hardly be said to be "taking a loss" to step from a slow or stationary conveyance into a more rapidly moving one which is headed toward that objective destination.

Such procedure may seem to some investors too much like "taking a loss," and to them is open the alternative of holding their industrial securities, but using them as working collateral with which to purchase rails or public utilities, and thus be in position to benefit by any price appreciation shown either by the old securities or the new. It should be remembered that while the industrial security has depreciated in price, the rail security is depreciated even further below its normal level as a rule.

This readjustment period is peculiarly the time when investor should remember and put to actual use the working power of the securities which he holds and does not desire to market.

The stock market continues its very irregular course, affected at times generally by tight money conditions and at other times, so far as different groups are concerned, by such developments as the continuing liquidation in the market for commodities and most manufactured products, the improving railroad situation, due to the working out of the rate increases; foreign selling, induced by extreme weakness in foreign exchange; belated appreciation of the fact that the public utilities of the country must be favored with the same sort of constructive rate increases that are enjoyed by the railroads and by the tendency toward lower prices for commodities and wages, while in individual cases special developments, of course, have operated at times to bring about wide fluctuations. If we were in a hull year we could take heart of hope and look forward to a very splendid rise this month in the general averages, but we are not in a hull year, and though prices of many stocks have gone a good deal below their intrinsic value, still, with the hanks loaned up and demanding liquidation on the part of their debtors and probably with the severest money test still to be experienced, we can look only for a great deal of irregularity this month, punctuated by serious declines now and then.

Much is being made of the manner in which new security offerings have been snapped up, and in this connection it has been proclaimed that there is no possibility of that sort of congestion of securities that at times in former markets brought disaster.

We may not necessarily look for disaster from this source now, for the securities that are being offered are netting very large returns and eventually should respond to easier credit conditions when they come. Recognizing the large returns that are offered, there has, however, been very wide participation in of 6 per cent. to every railroad. The purpose of this bulletin is to correct that impression.

Following the specific requirements of the new law, the Interstate Commerce Commission divided the United States into four regions for rate-making purposes—(1) the Eastern States; (2) the Southern States; (3) the central part of the country, east of the Rocky Mountains, and (4) the territory west of the Rockies. This done, the commission made a valuation of all the railroads by regions, and then established freight and passenger rates which, in its judgment, would give an aggregate return of 6 per cent. on the total value of the railroad property in each region. But no individual road is guaranteed 6 per cent., nor any other rate of return.

The law fixed 5½ per cent. as the minimum earnings on which the combined railroads of a region can safely operate, and gave the commission the discretion of raising the minimum rate of return to 6 per cent., which was done in the case recently decided.

Competition—one purpose of the law—is maintained in every region, and the railroads will fight for business as they did before the war. If any road fails to secure sufficient business to make 6 per cent. on its valuation it is out of luck, and must look to some source other than the government for direct relief; the law does not give it. If any road makes more than 6 per cent. it must split the excess earnings with the government for the creation of a fund from which weak roads may borrow in emergencies. If all the roads combined in a region earn 6 per cent. the law will these various financing enterprises, and, indeed, to such an extent that in some conservative quarters not a little attention is being paid to the element of speculation that is entering into the buying and to what has been aptly termed the participation by "joy-riding syndicates" whose demands for speculative purposes have played no small part in absorbing the offerings as they have come on the market.

satisfied we will be running into a period where these speculative syndicates have too many securities on hand and will be forced to dispose of them. Indeed, the situation is not without some dangerous elements, and should they develop they would naturally react definitely on the stock market.

What looks like a good investment at the present time is Standard Oil of New Jersey, now that Standard Oil of Indiana has announced its melon policy, and in view of its own remarkable expansion of profitable production, due to the many new millions that have been provided through the sale of preferred stock.

The expanding earnings of Philadelphia Company are so striking, and its prospects for next year are altogether so alluring, that it looks like another good security to buy and hold, for it is one which offers peculiarly favorable opportunities for profit in place of other stocks that may have depreciated in value even to the extent of 50 per cent. as compared to purchase prices.—The Trader.

Net earnings for the past three years have averaged more than four times dividend requirements, and, assuming their continuity at that rate, without taking into consideration any increase due to the use of this additional capital in the business, sinking fund based thereon would retire this issue within fifteen years. Net earnings for the first nine months of this year were $91,110.10, an increase of 44 per cent. over the same period last year.

State public service commissions are taking a firm stand for equitable treatment of public utilities. The following statement, made by the Washington state commission, is typical: "The great majority of people affected have realized that the utilities' expenses, like their own, have expanded, compelling increased revenues. There are some, however, who cheerfully pay $12 for a pair of shoes for which they formerly paid $5 and who complain bitterly if the cost of a utility's commodity is increased 25 cents a month, and accuse the commission of a favoritism towards the company if any increase whatever is allowed to meet growing wages and material prices. They seem to forget that the bulk of the expense in operating most utilities is labor, and that each member of the great army engaged in rendering public service is compelled to purchase the necessities of life at the same high cost that confronts us all."

"We realize that it is not a popular thing to increase rates. It would be easy to deny such application and pose dramatically as friends of the people, standing between them and corporate greed. We occupy a position of great responsibility. We have it in our power to bring ruin and disaster to many hundreds of utilities and rend the financial fabric of the state. It is difficult now to secure capital for public service enterprises, and this commission, by a rash stroke of the pen, could make it impossible in the State of Washington."

Poetical Parodies.

There are parodies that detract from and parodies that enhance the values of the originals, parodies that are benevolent and parodies that are malicious. Mr. Powell's parodies belong to that class that the poets themselves will welcome. They are of the nature of eulogies.

This little volume contains forty verse parodies, and among their "victims" are Chesterton, Masfield, Noyes, Kipling, Yeats, Swinburne, Henley, Rossetti, Whitman, Khayyam, Browning, Poe, and Tennyson.

From Poultry to Politics.

Crevecoeur, the French colonial settler in America who left his name in the American poultry yard, has found his biographer. Which statement, by the way, is not fair to Monsieur Crevecoeur. For, while the Frenchman is widely remembered because of the rarely good quality of fowl which he succeeded in breeding, he was considerably more of a statesman and a commentator on political affairs than he was a farmer. St. Jean de Crevecoeur came to America from France about 1764, bringing with him a sort of Thoreau love for the woods and the farm. He established himself in Orange County, New York, and thence wrote communications to French papers which became celebrated for their combined descriptions of hucolic America and comments on colonial politics and trade. The communications are familiar to all students of history under the title of "Letters from an American Farmer." After some years in the United States, Crevecoeur returned to France and became highly active in promoting the development of commerce between that country and America. The story of his life is interesting. It has just been carefully reviewed by Julia Post Mitchell in a doctor's thesis issued by the Columbia University Press of New York.

In Morocco.

Mrs. Wharton shows us how a travel book ought to be written. She visited Morocco in 1918 and now she writes a sort of guide book for the benefit of tourists, who deserve no benefit, either of clergy or otherwise. Let us hope that Mrs. Wharton's expectations will not be fulfilled and that the tourist horde will not be able to effect the ruin of one of the few hits of antiquity that remain to us.

But it is a wonderful piece of work. Mrs. Wharton almost succeeds in bringing Morocco before our eyes. We see the towns, the valleys, and the oases, the mosques, the ghettos, and the dwellings. They pass before the eyes like a panorama. We almost hear the sounds and smell the odors.

But it is not only of the Morocco of today that Mrs. Wharton writes. She gives us fascinating glimpses of history from the days of Rome onward, of the city of Volubilis, of the sacred city of Moulay Idris, of the ruins of Meknez and of Marrakech. Mrs. Wharton entertains no illusions about Morocco for the Moroccans, and it is indeed pleasant to find a writer so wholly free from the modern political idealisms that have done so much to shake the world loose from its moorings.

IN MOROCCO. By Edith Wharton. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

A Galsworthy Novel.

"In Chancery" is a sequel to John Galsworthy's finest work of fiction, entitled "A Man of Property." The intending reader, however, should first secure "Five Tales," in one of which, "Indian Summer," Mr. Galsworthy makes us reacquainted with Irene, the wife of Soames Forsyte, whose life was so tragically rent in twain by her flight from Soames' unendurable passion and by the death of Bosinney, her lover.

The characters of the earlier work reappear in "In Chancery," and again the tenacious sense of property in the Forsyte family is dwelt on. So strong and enduring it is that when Soames sees Irene again it revives to all its passionate strength, and with the same urgent passion as in his younger years he seeks to regain possession of his—legally—reluctant property: the still lovely Irene of universal and wistful charm.

Galsworthy appreciators will be exceedingly interested in this revival of a tale that was only partly told. His depiction of the family life and relationships of the numerous Forsytes is the work of a man who has a genius for this sort of thing. He seems to know the withered hearts of old ladies, the withered ambitions of old men, as well as the passionate hearts of youth and the tenacious longings of maturity. The reader always feels an intense sense of reality, while absorbing these family chronicles by a man deeply skilled in an intuitive perception of the secrets of human hearts.

Nor is the novelist's fine perception confined to the depiction of members of the British class, for the portraits of the two French women, both mother and daughter, are models of perspicacity and penetrating insight.

"In Chancery" deals largely with the secret aspirations of mature people, but this picture of middle-class family and social life necessarily includes youthful figures. Into their young hearts the magician sees with the same sympathetic divination, but it is the mature who most deeply interest him. And yet there is a wonderful interest attached to the failing nonagenarian, Soames' father, whose fading flame of life is guarded with such jealous care. Time, that has scarcely cooled those hot hearts of "A Man of Property," has, however, brought this family chronicle down to war-times, so the book writes almost of the immediate present.

THE AGE OF INNOCENCE

By Edith Wharton

A brilliant novel of New York society in the early seventies. The glories, the whims, the virtues, and the frailties of New York's "Four Hundred" of an earlier day caught and reflected by a writer who is recognized as one of America's foremost living novelists. William Lyon Phelps, the distinguished critic, says in the New York Times: "Here is a novel whose basis is a story. New York society and customs in the seventies are described with an accuracy that is almost uncanny. . . . Edith Wharton is a writer who brings glory on the name America—and this is her best book. . . . It is one of the best novels of the twentieth century."

MEMOIRS of the EMPRESS EUGENIE

By Comte Fleury

Undoubtedly this is the year's most important biography. The intimate life story of the most romantic figure of the nineteenth century, compiled from statements, private documents, and personal letters of the Empress Eugenie, from conversations of the Emperor Napoleon III, and from letters and papers of famous members of the Court of the Second Empire. The Atlantic Monthly says: "It is for that world army of readers who can appreciate a thoroughly human story. It is a fair guess that no book will be more widely read or more earnestly discussed." Two volumes. 1050 pages.

By ZONA GALE

Newspaper reviewers, famous men of letters, and the reading public generally have pronounced this book the nearest approach to the great American novel that has yet been written. It is the story of a small-town old maid who through a strange chain of circumstances finds herself involved in bigamy, an elopement, and who finally absconds with the only "eligible" in town. "Miss Lulu Bett" is without flaw . . . eloquent with condensation."

The Empress Eugenie.

Strictly speaking, these are not the memoirs of the Empress Eugenie, nor can they be described even as her biography. It would be more correct to say that we have here a chapter of the history of France written by one who was not only behind the scenes, but who had exceptional opportunities to interpret and understand events from the imperial standpoint. Comte Fleury was an intimate friend of the emperor and of Eugenie. He seems to have had their confidence in every respect and to have conversed with them constantly on affairs of state and French national policies. Also he had access to the archives of France and to the diaries and correspondence of many important officials that would probably never have been published but for his mediation. The friendship of Comte Fleury for Napoleon and Eugenie undoubtedly gives a tint to his narrative, and while this should be carefully remembered it in no way detracts either from the value or the accuracy of a story which consists so largely of substantial fact. Indeed it may be considered as an adornment and as adding to the narrative a warmth that it might otherwise lack.

The death of Eugenie occurred at a time when the world was occupied with events greater by far than any that she had known as empress. To what extent this may serve to lessen interest in history that seems now to be almost prehistoric remains to be seen. That it must have that effect for a time seems certain, in spite of the fact that the great war was a result as well as a cause and that many of its roots may be traced through the period of the Second Empire. But whatever obscuration the war may effect upon Comte Fleury's work will be only temporary. Its values, and they are great, will assert themselves in due time. Even the most cursory glance at its pages shows them to be filled with material that no historian can overlook and that will add greatly to our comprehension of a period that will remain as one of the most important in the history of the world.

Cousin Nancy.

Among the better class of books for girls may be counted this new story by Gene Stone with illustrations in color. It is a story of the Sierra Nevadas and of a family in humble circumstances to whom comes an intensely modern Eastern cousin with her experiences of personal services and of a life of ease. The process of adjustment is well described, and in a wholesome, invigorating way.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

No event of the present book publishing season has created such a sensation as the announcement made this week that all of the future writings of the most popular novelist in the world, Harold Bell Wright, are to bear the imprint of D. Appleton & Co., New York and London.

"Best autobiography of our time," said Lord Northcliffe last week in a cable to Edward Bok anent Mr. Bok's much-discussed story of his life.

Henry Holt & Co. announce that during the past three weeks the entire eleventh printing of "Abraham Lincoln," by Lord Charnwood, was sold out. A new printing of this remarkable biography is now on the press and will be ready for distribution within a few days.

In her book on "Feminism and Sex-Extinction," which E. P. Dutton & Co. published last week, Arabella Kenealy takes the position that extreme feminism, aiming to eliminate differences of thought, outlook, and occupation between men and women and bring about feminine competition with men in all departments of life, is bound to result in great injuries to the race.

"An Adventure with a Genius," to be published by E. P. Dutton & Co. early in November, presents a piece of modern biography in an uncommonly interesting treatment. The book is the story of Joseph Pulitzer, told by Alleyne Ireland, who was his secretary. It was privately printed some time ago under the title of "Joseph Pulitzer: Reminiscences of a Secretary," but in his preface to the new edition Mr. Ireland explains that he has received many suggestions to the effect that the material is better described as "An Adventure with a Genius."

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY, New York

"TIGER ROSE."

Willard Mack's "melodrama of the Great Northwest" is a Belasco production, but that doesn't say as much as it ordinarily does, for the reason that the company is not, well—exactly first chop. They have economized on us in this respect. One can scarcely blame them. Business is business. The name alone "Tiger Rose" will draw because of the long run the play has had in the East.

There are various signs of economy in the theatrical world today, one of which is the unusual number of stage resurrections of old plays, many of them much better worth seeing than up-to-date pieces by up-to-date writers. So, as "Tiger Rose" is the work of a writer of the immediate present, that, in the estimate of the average theatre-goer, is score one. Score two is the production as a production, scenery, lights, stage groupings, and a magnificent thunderstorm all having the Belasco stamp. Score three is that the company, although not first chop, has been very carefully selected. It is more than probable that Willard Mack had Lenore Ulric, who played the title-role with great success, in mind when he wrote "Tiger Rose." The little Canadian is a creature of fire and dew; at least that was the phrase Mr. Mack had in mind when he compounded her. Then there is a manly, warm-hearted old Scot; also the romantic figure of a doctor, on a blood quest in the far-reaching wilds of the Northwest, for he seeks his wife's seducer. There are, of course, an abundance of young men, most of them in love with the one girl extant; such conditions usually prevailing in Northwests.

The girl is under the paternal guardianship of the Scotch factor of the Hudson Bay Post, who speaks in a broad Scotch dialect, the girl expressing herself in a prettily conceived patois, while Constable Devlin, R. N. W. M. P., has an Irish brogue, and Pierre La Bey, a Gilbert-Parkerish youth who loves Rose and his violin, uses the same patois as Rose; or tries to.

Now I call that cruelty to animals, having all those dialects in one play. It keeps one on the jump trying to assimilate the various deviations from normal speech, although the players continually made us feel at home by producing phrases in pure Americancese, fully charged with that dreadful, unescapable r that seems to be becoming more and more the ear-mark of the American speech.

That is another sign that the company is not first chop: their crude speech. Still another is shown in faulty technic. Francesco Cappellano, the leading lady, who did a creditable piece of work as Tiger Rose, has a terrifically long and exhausting scene of emotion and wild revolt and struggle against the carrying off by the constabulary of "her man." But the leading lady has not mastered the technic of stage sohs, and she not only exhausted herself, but tired out such of her audience as had the discernment to notice it. Perhaps Miss Cappellano had a sudden promotion and was catapulted into the rôle unexpectedly for this Western tour on account of several qualifications she has: her vivacity, her impetuosity of movement, her success with the dialect, her dark, expressive eyes. But if that is so the lady should hunt up some exponent of stage love—such as Emelie Melville, for instance, here—in every city in which she plays long enough, and receive instruction in the art of stage sohhing.

I don't seem to find any one player in the company to entuse over, although there were traits here and there. The men are a fair, upstanding, athletic group, and I admired Jack G. Bertin's voice, and enjoyed a sense of aesthetic gratification at seeing Bernard McOwen's easy physical poise, and the grace and strength of his movements. Charles Reigel, in spite of the thick Scotch he had to express himself in, was rather simpler and more sincere in effect than the others.

There was one flaw in stage directorship that rather surprised me in a Belasco production. There was a long scene between Rose and the constable in which the latter stood square in front of her, pretty effectively blocking our view of her. Perhaps I may seem unduly severe, for I must admit to dealing rather tenderly sometimes with our local players. But really, when an organization crosses thousands of miles of intervening continent to get here, giving us a play that has had a long and prosperous run, and we look forward joyfully to seeing very good acting, we are certainly justified in pointing out the defects that we are already quite too familiar with in our own home-town players.

As to the play: well, Mr. Mack. I think, has rather over-elaborated the construction of his melodrama. Whistler once said something to the effect that art can be great only when the means by which it is accomplished remain invisible. Mr. Mack, no doubt, while not hoping to achieve a great art work, at least is willing, no doubt, humbly to use the best means, and he did not use the best when he allowed his machinery to be so plainly visible. To mention one point, when old Tom, with marked deliberation, diverted observation from those in the stage centre and, with no apparent purpose in view save to do his morning's work, descended the trap-door stairs, we knew that that trap-door would subsequently be hated in the spotlight. There is a lot of technic of the kind in the play, but it is a little too obvious.

The author, however, has accomplished atmosphere, and he has located his play in an interesting corner of our big continent. It isn't native drama, but if it isn't United Statesian it is at least American, which brings it pretty close to being native.

THE THIRD POPULAR CONCERT.

Which of our regular local attractions oftenest draws capacity houses? Answer quickly, now—right off the hat. Yes, you're right; the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, with the Orpheum following as a close second. Funny old public! It crowds the houses in musical comedy; but go to the matinee performances, and what a fall, my countrymen. That's because female legs don't draw females. (Please excuse me, female. But, after all, we are.)

Sunday afternoon the Curran was full. The audience had catholicity of taste, for it listened with devotion and solemn ecstasy to the fateful questionings in the Andante con moto movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, wiped the dew from its eyes as the orchestra rendered "Ase's Death" in strains that expressed, oh, with such infinite beauty and sadness, the capacity of the human heart to suffer sorrow and its uncontrollable longing to soften that sorrow with hope.

It no doubt recognized in the music of the "Bacchanal" of "Tannhäuser" a tone picture of considerable analogy to the soulless hubbub a modern American crowd can make on a New Year's eve. It could not fail, as always, to surrender itself to the religious fervor expressed in the soaring measures of the "Pilgrims' Chorus." It gayly insisted on an encore to "In the Hall of the Mountain King," enjoyed like a composite youngster that tinkling trifle, "The Music Box," and insisted on another, and, in fact, surrendered itself utterly to the delight of the harmonies evoked by Hertz' magic haton.

For it seems as if we could note in each concert the growing beauty of tone and the increasing variety of tone colors with which the musicians make their strains breathe the language of the emotions.

They warmed our hearts with notes the color of sunshine in the "Morning" of the Grieg suite. And it seemed a miracle to listen, in one programme, to two compositions rendered with such inconceivable, such heart-subduing, soul-elevating loveliness as the Andante con moto and "Ase's Death."

There were others, all superbly done. We even had moments of keen pleasure in the over-elaborate "Italia." But those specially mentioned were the pearls of great price.

How strange it seemed, as we listened to the "Peer Gynt" suite, and especially to "Ase's Death," that Ibsen, who did not care for nor understand music, could never know how ideal was the marriage of his text with Grieg's tones. Edmund Gosse says that Ibsen made pathetic efforts to appreciate Grieg's "Peer Gynt" music, but all in vain. No doubt many, many readers have been wooed into trying to plumb the unplumbable "Peer Gynt," after hearing Grieg's suite. For "Peer Gynt" is certainly caviare to the general. But their failure is nothing to that of the great Norwegian seer, whose ear was so delicately attuned to verbal euphony, and yet unable to appreciate the mournful soul music of "Ase's Death."

"FEDYA."

"Fedya," out at the Players' Theatre, has nearly run its course, and here I am unenterprisingly late in seeing an extremely interesting performance. The membership of the Players' Club, it seems, has been steadily increasing. This makes a larger number of players to draw on, and there were three decidedly interesting young women in the cast whose work is new to me. Hilda Denizelle, come to think, we have already seen in "The Breaking of the Calm." But to me the other two, Kathleen Rucker and Talmazetta Wilbur—a name, by the way, cunningly calculated to haffle the ordinary memory—are unfamiliar.

"Fedya" is not built on ordinary lines. It contains two acts, of which the first is divided into six episodes and the second into four. Compared to our modern method of having the action of plays, as in "The Doll's House," transpire in one setting one would think all these Shakespearean changes would make the play unreal. Tolstoy, however, can safely defy such conventions depriving him of his quality of lifelikeness. That grim old humanitarian, if he did not know how to live his own life normally, knew how to depict the lives and souls of others.

Fedya is an erratic, lovable, heart-breakingly incalculable, dissolute young partician, and William S. Rainey invests the character with that aura of romantic charm necessary to draw sympathy and liking for the engaging sinner. He looks like a modern Hamlet in his black mantel, with that artistic looseness to his collar that has its own subtle suggestion. Fedya, like so many of Galsworthy's characters, can not conform, and Mr. Rainey indicates by his dreamy expression, the slack of his lips, and the sudden changes of mood and pose this fatal, temperamental weakness in a man too fastidious to lie or to seduce.

In contrast to Fedya is Masha, the gipsy

"Lake Merced is about seven miles from the city, and is located not far from the Ocean House track. The drive from Golden Gate Park to the Ocean House is well known as one of the pleasantest in the country. The lake is only a short distance from the house."—Alta, Nov. 24, 1872.

La Laguna de la Merced was so named by Don Bruno de Heceta in 1775 because September 24—the day he encamped there—was the feast day of Our Lady of Mercy.

The lake is in the southwestern corner of San Francisco, and has a water surface of 336 acres. It has been in use since 1877, and now supplies 3½ million gallons daily. Its storage capacity is 2 billion 659 million gallons.

Its waters rise from innumerable springs in the lake-bed after filtering through the sandy soil of a watershed about 8 square miles in extent.

The surface waters that drain from the surrounding region never reach the lake, being carefully diverted to the ocean.

Additional safeguard of Merced's purity is provided by ownership of all the land around the lake—some 2600 acres.

"The Broderick-Terry duel was fought on the morning of September 13, 1859, in the lower or westerly end of the first small ravine, which connects with the easterly shore of Lake Merced, just south of the county line between San Francisco and San Mateo."—Hermann Schussler.

girl, played by Kathleen Rucker with an abounding youthfulness of spirit, a swift, impetuous grace of movement, and a general suggestion of beauty, temperament, and charm that makes one wonder that the regular stage has not claimed this beautiful girl for its own. Lisa, the wife, is played by another gifted young woman, Talmazetta Wilbur possessing an interesting face and presence, an instinct for quiet but penetrating expression, both in feature and speech, and a soft, mellow voice. She speaks well, moves well, acts well, and knows how to make her artistically graceful costumes conform to the mood that she wishes to convey.

Hilda Denizelle, who is also a handsome young woman, played the rôle of the gray-haired mother of a grown son. If Mrs. Denizelle were a surer study she would be a better actress, for an occasional slight uncertainty weakened the effects at which she was aiming. But she gave to the Russian grande dame patrician beauty and the air of good breeding and usefulness to the amenities of the drawing-room to which many more experienced actresses can not even approximately attain. Also she dressed her appropriately.

These three ladies, with Mr. Rainey, were the outstanding figures in a cast nearly thirty characters long. Besides these four interesting impersonations there was a very good comedy characterization by Frederick McNulty, that of an eccentric, tipsy old derelict who is a combination of egomania, drunkenness, and futility.

In one scene, "an underground dive," in which Fedya is seen at his lowest ebb, Richard Leonard, as the sympathetic and deeply interested artist gently urging Fedya on to ease his breast of his life history, is but a voice in the dimness. But how well that voice expressed the character behind it and the artist's professional and temperamental interest in the self-revealing derelict under his keen yet sympathetic observation.

Besides these already mentioned, there were twenty-three other rôles, which necessitated a doubling up in some cases.

There is so much inferential psycho-analysis in "Fedya," and the seriousness of the play, although mitigated by some comedy, is so thoroughly well established in the consciousness of patrons of the little theatre, that the volatile play-goers have tossed the handkerchief to "Ruddigore," which is well sung, well played, and offers delightful entertainment. Consequently "Fedya" will be withdrawn and the number of performances of the Gilhert and Sullivan piece will be increased, Mr. Rainey assuming the rôle of the gay sailor lad, vide the engaging Easton Kent, who is called East. Nevertheless "Fedya" is to me among the most interesting performances given by the Players Club.

“THE ETERNAL MAGDALENE.”

Why of course! It just dawned on me as Elwyn Harvey entered a dark stage, her shape veiled in the Magdalene's dark mantle, that we had once seen Florence Roberts in this rôle.

"The Eternal Magdalene" is rather an old-fashioned play, but it approximates reaching the sympathies of audiences because of its reproach of the self-righteous citizen, who, from his seat in the odor of self-satisfied sanctity, forgets the sins of his youth and arrogantly hoses all the frivolous and the dissolute with the bitter waters of his condemnation.

The idea in "The Eternal Magdalene" is to show the intolerant activities of a group of reformers who are clearing out the vice element in their town. Elijah Bradshaw—played by Dudley Ayres, the leading man—makes himself very unpopular with an audience because he never smiles, has no toleration for erring humanity, and refuses to let his son and daughter go to "the show." Fate gets it in on Elijah, and the audience had the satisfaction of seeing his well-upholstered library become the background for a series of family tragedies; thus verifying the prophetic curse of a woman of the town who objected to being removed from her home at the behest of the reformers. The Eternal Magdalene is a statuesque female who accepts—or demands—a job in the Bradshaw home. The Magdalene moves around rather aimlessly, but her job is to see that Elijah's hard heart is softened before she gets after some other flinty-hearted reformer.

Becoming disgraced in the eyes of one's fellow-citizens is an excellent method of acquiring humility. Elijah becomes humble all right, and a volatile audience did all it could to help on.

It was a regular hair-trigger of an audience; Sunday nighters, and all ready for laughter. At any rate, when the spectators saw few laughs in sight they kept exploding—the grown-up children part of them—into sighs, snorts, coughs, and occasional giggles and gurgles in the wrong place. The more sensible element, however, gradually shushed off the unruly into being good, and made them applaud in the right places. For the laugh-hunters had shown a reprehensible tendency to applaud, with manifestations of the liveliest sympathy, sentiments that generally are expected to hang their discredited heads.

"The Eternal Magdalene" is a highly artificial play. It is a queer mixture, for the author gets his symbolism too much on the carpet. He—his name is Robert McLaughlin—tried his hand at something on the order of "The Servant in the House" or "The Passing of the Third Floor Back." He did not succeed, but neither did he fail, for in the "eternal Magdalene" idea he really had gotten hold of something. The idea stood for the universality of sin and the forgiveness of sinners, but it is rather cumbersomely worked out. There are several spotlights concentrated on places for the Magdalene and the reformer, and the author brings in a scene using the scriptural adjuration, "He that is without sin among you let him cast the first stone," that Maeterlinck borrowed from Paul Heyse's "Maria von Magdala" to use in "Mary Magdalene."

"The Eternal Magdalene" is an actory play, and I suppose actors like it. But I should judge from its reception by the Sunday night public that its artificialities are too pronounced. The company combatted these artificialities as best it could and gave the audience some of the sensations it wanted. Elwyn Harvey read her rather declamatory text well, Dudley Ayres gave a consistent impersonation of the reformer, and the remainder of the rather long cast did conscientious work.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

Beginning Sunday, November 21st, at the Columbia Theatre, "Tiger Rose" starts its second and last week. "Tiger Rose," as has been noted in the reviews given its presentation, is a melodrama. Its cast is headed by a trenchant player, Francesco Cappellano. Associated with her is Bernard McOwen, who plays with reckless devil-may-care a Royal Northwest Mounted Policeman and makes the rôle of Michael Devlin an exceedingly lovable one. Charles Riegel, an old-timer who has been here with the best players from the East, and James H. Lewis are two players whose parts stand out. So does that of Doctor Dan, played by J. J. Bertin, a player with a most resonant, pleasing voice. Frank Bryan makes a typical lover and Emily Lessing as the Indian squaw leaves nothing to be desired.

John Cort's big musical production, "Listen Lester," from a long run at the Knickerbocker Theatre, New York, comes to the Columbia Theatre on Monday, November 29th.

The Curran Theatre.

"Up in Mahel's Room," which starts on the second and last week of its successful engagement tomorrow night at the Curran Theatre, consists of three acts and is the work of Wilson Collison and Otto Harbach. It may be briefly described as a series of romantic and farcical complications caused by no less innocent an object than a beautiful lady's chemise. Garry gave the chemise to Mahel as a gift in a moment of sentimental aberration and foolishly had it inscribed in hold big letters, "Mahel from Garry."

A. H. Woods has selected an exceptionally good cast, which includes Josephine Saxe, Julie Ring, Sager Midgley, James Norval, Grace Fielding, Harry Bradley, and others.

There will be a special matinee Thursday (Thanksgiving Day) besides the regular matinee Saturday.

The Orpheum.

Kitty Gordon heads the Orpheum bill here next week. Of the statuesque type, her loveliness is so much a matter of record that everybody knows how very handsome Miss Gordon is without being told. As a star she has twinkled brilliantly in the musical-comedy, vaudeville, and picture firmament.

Jack Wilson, comedy celebrity, who, assisted by Frank Griffith and Vera Beresford, will be seen in "The Surprise," is well remembered here. His returns to the two-day always are as welcome as "the flowers that bloom in the spring."

Experience with the United States entertainment units in France made Tony Hunting and Corinne Frances as well known abroad as they are here. They are observing their return to vaudeville in this country next week with "The Flower Shop," a singing, dancing, and talking comedy skit.

Musical critics throughout the country agree that Rae Eleanor Ball is an exceptional violinist. Not only has she splendid technique and a wonderful tone, but she possesses, in addition, temperament and personality. This season she is aided by her brother, Joseph, known to the concert world as a remarkable cellist.

John and Nellie Olms, who style themselves "The Watch Wizards," are of the prestidigitator type. Their skillful and at times uncanny performance is with watches.

Of Dotson, the eccentric dancer, it has been said that he must be related to lightning, for both have the same characteristics. Dotson is a dancer with comedy for a side line.

The Three Weber Girls start out to be an exceedingly good singing and dancing act. Then they change their minds and wind up by being an exceptionally fine gymnastic turn.

"The Spirit of Mardi Gras," musical revue extraordinary, featuring the Mardi Gras Sextet, will remain one more week.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"Hedda Gabler," by Ibsen, will be given this coming week at the Maitland Playhouse on Stockton Street. As the first Ibsen play of the Maitland season, preliminary announcement has attracted more than the ordinary attention. Lovers of Ibsen will recall the play,

The play will be presented by an excellent cast, including J. Anthony Smythe, who made his first appearance this week, Arthur Maitland, Thomas Miller, Mary Morris, Hélène Marchand, and others.

"Quality Street," which is on the bill this week, closing Saturday night, is a dainty, delightful Barrie play that was given so successfully by Maude Adams.

The return of J. Anthony Smythe, a great favorite, has strengthened the Maitland company.

VANITY FAIR.

The French Academy has just given its naturalization papers to the word "gentleman" (says Henry D. Davray, writing in the Anglo-French Review). Although brilliantly received as a newcomer, the word is really an old friend somewhat changed by time and usage. Etymologically "gentleman" comes from the old French "gentilz hom." The two terms kept for a long time an identical sense and designated exactly the same kind of person. When, however, the Revolution suppressed the French nobility or at least its free development, the word "gentilhomme" fell gradually into disuse. The nobility created by Napoleon and even by the later kings was a kind of second nobility which, compared to the old noblesse, was considered as a little parvenu. Although the term "gentilhomme" was no longer applied to them, it was no less true that many Frenchmen showed the lofty sentiments, the elegance of manners, the nobility of action which corresponded to the ideals of the gentilhomme of former times, and it was in searching the vocabulary for a name for them, not a new, manufactured word, that the English "gentleman" came into use. Whoever, without being a "noble man of race," was well bred and agreeable was denominated "gentleman" to distinguish him from the rest of his countrymen whose merits and virtues, whatever they might be, were of a more ordinary character. It should be noted that a commoner who was ennobled did not himself become a "gentilhomme," but his sons were born "gentilshommes." The distinction is amusing and, after all, judicious. It recalls the saying of a clever Englishman when astonishment was expressed that a certain very rich and vulgar man had been elevated to the peerage: "As they could not make a gentleman of him, they made him a lord."

As one can easily imagine, there is no word more misused in the English language; no authorities agree on the limits of its application. To certain snobs every professional man and his sons are naturally gentlemen, while every tradesman and his descendants are beyond the pale. Last year, when there were no more war stories and when the peace conference had ceased to interest any one, a London daily asked its readers to formulate the definition of the word "gentleman" and to establish the rules of its application. Inextricable confusion resulted. The replies were so contradictory and so vehement that it was impossible to arrive at an authoritative definition or a reasonable limitation. The brilliant essayist, G. S. Street, was perfectly right when he urged, long ago, the suppression, pure and simple, of this term. If some day this suppression takes place by common consent and no one in English-speaking countries uses the word, the French Academy will have saved "gentleman" from oblivion—and since the English will always need a vocable to designate a gentleman, the British Academy can borrow from the French language the word "gentilhomme."

In Texas during the last cotton-picking season imported negro labor earned as high as $20 a day, and much of the crop was not picked. At the time of this labor shortage there were more than 100,000 soldiers in Texas.

Three-year-old Walter received his first boy's cap the other day. His Uncle John put it on one side of his head so that the bill was turned toward one ear. Then he carried Walter to the mirror. But the little fellow didn't like the effect. He began to twist the cap so that the bill would be in front. "I want the porch over my face," he explained to his uncle.

office, declared dramatically that he was being closely pressed by the police, and asked the head clerk where he could hide. The head clerk did not hesitate a moment. "Get into the simplified card index case," he said calmly. "I defy any one to find anything there."

A Pink, as the parlor Bolsheviks are now called, got into an argument at a Philadelphia smoker with Editor George H. Lorimer. "We all work pretty much alike," said the Pink. "In other words, we all do the best we can. Therefore, I claim that we all ought to be paid alike, and that would abolish class distinction—rich and poor." "I don't agree," said Editor Lorimer. "This equality idea leaves me cold." "But," said the Pink, "don't we all, after all, row in the same boat?" "Yes," said the editor, "but not with the same skulls."

A traveling salesman died suddenly, and was taken to his home in the West. His relatives telephoned to the nearest florist to make a wreath. The ribbon was to be extra wide, with the inscription, "Rest in Peace," on both sides, and if there was room, "We shall meet in Heaven." The florist was away and his new assistant handled the job. It was a startling floral piece which turned up at the funeral. The ribbon was extra wide, and bore the inscription: "Rest in Peace on Both Sides and If There Is Room We Shall Meet in Heaven."

Sir Auckland Geddes, the new British ambassador, was talking at a luncheon in Philadelphia about seasickness. "There are numerous remedies for seasickness," he said. "Some advise cotton in the ears; others recommend smoked glasses; a champagne diet has its votaries; fasting has its advantages as well; but I, for my part, however, incline to the old skipper's view. 'Oh, captain,' moaned a lady passenger, 'my husband is frightfully seasick. Can you tell him what to do?' 'It aint necessary to tell him, ma'am. He'll do it,' said the old skipper gruffly."

THE MERRY MUSE.

An Athletic Lover.

My sweetheart is keen on athletics;
At tennis and golf she's a "crack";
While I, though I know arithmetics,
Am far from a star on the "track";
But she is not scornful, like some belles,
And does not discourage me quite,
Since I have procured me some dumbbells,
And practice by night!

I used to set forth with a lunch bag
When morning came up with its glow;
But now I must carry a punch bag,
For I am in training, you know.
I go (though I can not say gayly)
To those that give massage and rubs,
While I am conversant (and daily)
With Indian clubs!

I labor with weight and with pulley
Until I feel desperate—well,
I hope I won't turn out a bully,
And yet, yet you never can tell!
For should she persist in evasion
Whenever I woo her to win
I think I should try strong persuasion,
And gather her in!

—Clinton Scollard in Judge.

In the Gazing Crystal.

Out of the East you come, the dreamy East,
Holding what message in your crystal deeps;
Above you loomed perchance some pagan priest
In far forgotten lands where silence creeps.
Perhaps beld by some princess who now sleeps,
Knowing your prophecy as false or true;
What golden tide of fortune near me sweeps,
Or what depth of disaster is my due.

Always I ponder on life's tangled skein,
And far I'm buffeted by tedious tides;
The future's dim wherein I peer and strain,
And from your strength I look for friendly guides;
Tell me shall we forget our growing thirst,
And do I get a flat on May the first?

The Alcazar Theatre.

The emotional sweep of this week's play, "The Eternal Magdalene" will be followed at the Alcazar next Sunday by a novelty in full accord with the spirit of Thanksgiving week. "Five O'Clock" was pronounced an unusual play when given at the Fulton, New York. Keen interest attaches to its premiere in California, where its author, Frank Bacon, still claims his home, despite a phenomenal success as star and co-author of "Lightnin'," still playing to capacity in its third year in New York. "Five O'Clock" shows how a gifted young fellow was railroaded to a so-called sanatorium and kept there by a crooked relative and his hought "specialist." It demonstrates how absurd a so-called "mental examination" may be made by the expenditure of money. Such is the variety of dramatic incident that Jack Lait, dramatist and noted fictionist, in reviewing its premiere, wrote: "New York never before saw a play like 'Five O'Clock.' Frank Bacon's comedy made an audience laugh uproariously, weep unashamed, and go out delighted, wondering, and talking." Dudley Ayres will personate the same man who was railroaded, with Elwyn Harvey the superintendent's daughter, who helped him regain freedom. There are splendid character types for Ben Erway, Charles Yule, Rafael Brunetto, Al Cunningham, Frederick Green, Emily Pinter, Edna Peckham, and others.

"Crooked Gamblers," November 28th, is another of the many New York current successes that San Francisco would not see but for the Alcazar. It is a comedy of frenzied stock speculation by Samuel Shipman, co-author of "Friendly Enemies," and Percival Wilde, produced at the Hudson Theatre only last July by A. H. Woods, who has released it for the Alcazar only, as it does not tour the Coast.

Raoul Vidas.

Following the American debut in Carnegie Hall, New York, of the gifted young violinist, Raoul Vidas, who will be heard in double concert with Charles Hackett, lyric tenor of the Metropolitan, under the local direction of Frank W. Healy at the Scottish Rite Auditorium, Sunday afternoon, December 5th, the following tribute appeared in the New York Tribune:

"The large audience which gathered at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon upon the occasion of the American debut of Raoul Vidas, French violinist, did credit to its appreciation of musical artistry by the warmth of welcome it accorded him.

"It discovered in him a violinist who will make his contemporaries, even in the first rank, look to their laurels, if he maintains the high standard which his playing yesterday revealed. He came, not as the heralded product of a master's hand, but as an artist standing upon his own merits for recognition. That recognition was not long delayed."

"Mr. Vidas has to a remarkable degree the essentials of the violinist's equipment—an agile left hand, flexible, pleasing tone of fine sonority in the lower register, clearness and brilliance in the upper, distinction in phrasing and warmth of feeling tempered by good taste."

Mr. Healy is also offering other artists, including Louis Graveure, the baritone; Leo Ornstein, pianist, and Mme. Frances Alda, soprano. Season tickets for the entire series can be purchased at greatly reduced rates.

Players Theatre.

Monday begins the last week of the fall repertory season at the Players Theatre on Bush Street. To accommodate the demand for seats for Gilbert and Sullivan's "Ruddigore" it will be given every evening but Wednesday and Friday, including a special Saturday matinee on November 27th. Considerable interest has been aroused in the announcement that William S. Rainey will sing the tenor rôle of Richard Dauntless for these last performances. Tolstoy's drama, "Fedya," will be played for the last two times on Wednesday and Friday evenings. The Players Theatre will open again with an entirely new repertory immediately after the holidays.

Captain Bruce Bairnsfather.

Captain Bruce Bairnsfather, the famous British cartoonist, who is intimately known to us through his books and his comedy, "The Better Ole," will visit San Francisco early in December to deliver his new lecture, entitled "Old Bill, Me and the Income Tax," which he will illustrate with rapid-fire cartoons drawn on the stage.

In discussing present conditions in England, Captain Bairnsfather said that there had been the same psychological reaction there as in other countries. "There is," he remarked, "a universal desire to blot out everything relating to the war. People avoid talking about it as much as possible and turn their thoughts to other things."

"On this account I am devoting my cartoons to subjects unconnected with the war, and am endeavoring, bard as it is, to show the humorous side of the income tax, the strikes, high cost of living, and other painful subjects. 'People in England seem to appreciate this sort of humor, and even in the midst of the recent coal strike I lectured to record-breaking audiences. At Birmingham, a few days before I sailed, I lectured to over three thousand people who filled the largest auditorium in the city, and hundreds were turned away."

"The capacity of the English masses to find humor in practically everything will, in my opinion, save England from any serious radical revolutionary movement. They succeed in Russia very largely because the Slav is a gloomy fellow. In England one hears a great deal about Bolshevism and predictions that something terrible will happen, but as a matter of fact nothing ever does happen, and everybody goes to the football game or the theatre."

"Englishmen, just now, are far more interested in what prices are going to do and who is going to strike next than they are in politics of any kind."

Tetrazzini.

Under the management of W. H. Leahy, proprietor of the Tivoli Opera House, Mme. Luisa Tetrazzini is having one of the most successful tours of her entire career. Recently Tetrazzini, who will appear in San Francisco at the Exposition Auditorium March 27th (Easter Sunday), under the local direction of Frank W. Healy, gave a concert in Minneapolis. Here is what Victor Nilson of the Minneapolis Journal said:

"Luisa Tetrazzini has not begun her farewell tours yet. It is much too early. Returning last night to the twin cities for an appearance at the St. Paul Auditorium after nine years of absence, she is still more the marvel of exuberance, vitality, and brilliancy of voice than ever."

Symphony Orchestra.

Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, will appear as soloist with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon in the Curran Theatre. He will play Beethoven's

"What a relief! No Thanksgiving worries for me this year."

"How's that?"

"Why, Hotel Whitcomb is giving a real, old-fashioned Thanksgiving Dinner. Everything I had planned to have is on the menu, from roast turkey and candied sweet potatoes to mince pie. So we are going to dine there."

"That's a splendid idea. I think we will do that too."

"Emperor" concerto in E flat. The symphony to be played is Brahms' first in C minor, a work stupendous in its conception and one in which Alfred Hertz fully displays his skill as an interpreter of Brahms. The remaining number on the programme is the weirdly beautiful "Swan of Tuonela" of Sibelius.

Next Sunday, November 28th, Kajetan Attil will be the soloist at the popular concert. He will play Saint-Saëns' brilliant fantasy for harp. Other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture, the Andante con moto from Schubert's C Major Symphony, Saint-Saëns' "Algerienne" suite, and Massenet's "Le Cid" ballet suite. The closing number will be Tchaikowsky's March Slav.

Bridge Tea.

Another of the popular bridge-teas arranged by the Hotel Whitcomb took place on last Tuesday afternoon. The score prize given as the compliment of the hotel was won by Mrs. Joseph Rotbchild, who was a table guest of Mrs. A. Weilberg of Cincinnati. The list of patronesses of these charming parties is steadily increasing as the season advances.

"Pomander Walk," a delightful comedy with a London setting, but written by Louis Napoleon Parker, an American playwright, is to be one of the attractions during the month of December at the Maitland Playhouse.

Comfortable!

Yes--indeed

Imagine a little instrument on the wall which will turn on the heat in the morning before you get up—and that the same marvelous instrument will keep the temperature just right all day long—not too hot or too cold—and you never touch it or even look at it. One might say this is expecting too much? Not at all.

The Automatic Gas Furnace will do just such perfect work—it is the last word in heating comfort. No trips to the basement, no fuel or ashes to bother with—clean as a pin.

Does it cost much to run? This question can best be answered by the hundreds of San Francisco people who are now actually using this modern gas-heating equipment. We would like to have you ask them.

It may be that you need "Right Heat" in your home and have not kept pace with the tremendous progress made in such appliances. Will you not permit us to send you, without obligation, the names of those who "Heat the modern way?" It is at least worth a phone call to know—act today.

The President and the Elections.

The President seems to be in no way cast down by the result of the elections, perhaps because the result was a foregone conclusion. He has recently taken several rides in spite of the inclement weather and—more significant still—Dr. Grayson now goes home to sleep for the first time since the President's illness. There seems to be no doubt that the President and Mrs. Wilson intend to remain in Washington after March 4th, and it is believed that they will occupy the Grayson house on Wisconsin Avenue. Mr. Tumulty will also remain and discharge his new duties as judge of the Court of Customs Appeal. His qualifications for that position are not quite apparent, unless his fidelity to his chief is so considered. Probably there is no truth in the rumor that Mr. Tumulty will become chairman of the National Democratic Committee, but he is sure to remain in touch with Mr. Wilson, and perhaps supply him with the ammunition to be used in attacks on the new government.

Some of the more ardent of the President's champions are expressing resentment at what they describe as a callous attitude toward his illness on the part of his opponents. There is, of course, no ground for such a charge. Sympathy with the President has been marked and general. Party strife may be acrimonious, but it never descends to such a depth as that. Moreover, it is to be remembered that the real nature of the President's illness has been studiously concealed from the public and its gravity denied, even to the point of some violation of the veracities. To this day there is little but surmise and conjecture, often contradictory, as to the President's condition and its fluctuations. Instead of reliable medical bulletins we have been left to the chance observations of reporters and the almost valueless opinions of favored visitors. There is no American anywhere, probably no human being anywhere, who does not hope for the President's complete restoration to health and for his participation in those unofficial counsels that make for the creation and maintenance of public opinion.

Finance and the Future.

The new Congress will be called upon to address itself to questions not so spectacular as the treaty or the league of nations, but even more emergent and more impatient for settlement. We may believe, perhaps with a touch of cynicism, that a situation begun with a scrap of paper will not be greatly mended nor marred by other scraps of paper. At least they must have a secondary place in the order of precedence.

But the economic problem can not wait. Already the air is full of portents, and they refuse to be dissipated by an airy optimism. Agriculture and industry are in a bad way. Prices have fallen during the last six months at an unprecedented rate. There has been over-production everywhere. European markets have been closed to us by the rates of exchange, and our own markets are hampered by our mischievous experiments in government ownership that have led to an almost hopeless congestion. The textile industry is nearly at a standstill. The foreigner is eager to buy, but he can not do so, and at home we are faced with what may be called a buyers' strike. The public has buttoned its pockets and made up its mind to go without. Factories that were geared to the high production level by war and extravagance now find that their goods are unsalable. Prices are being cut everywhere in a frantic effort to unload, and factories are either closing altogether or running on half-time. Depression in the iron trade is marked and there is no activity in the building either of homes or of railroads. Capital, in other words, is frightened. Why should it go in search of profits that must be handed over to the government? National securities may pay a lower rate of interest, but at least they are safe, and they are usually tax exempt. There is nothing to tempt capital into industry. Indeed there is every sort of warning to hold aloof.

There are three factors in the high cost of living that have remained stationary. First there is the deficiency of houses. The cost of building material is extraordinarily high, and this implicates the evils of our transportation and distribution systems. With agriculture suffering heavily there will be no "back to the land" movement. The movement will be the other way. It is to be feared that the only remedy for the housing evil is the inevitable one of foreclosures and bankruptcies that will force reductions all along the line and so stimulate legitimate building operations.

The second factor is transportation. Here, too, the only remedy is time. Government control produced chaos in the railroads and inefficiency became the order of the day. A car of foodstuffs will be spoiled by delay and the loss is added to prices. Indeed the loss is added before it happens by way of precaution. We shall have to wait in patience for the reestablishment of efficiency in railroad service, and with only the poor consolation that we ourselves are responsible.

The third factor is the cost of government. Congress can apply the remedy here, but it is doubtful if Congress will do so. It is too malleable, ductile, compressible, soft. Every department, like Oliver Twist, clamors for more. Every sort of special interest pleads for relief. Only the louder voices are heard, only the importunities succeed. Merely to slash the appropriations will do no good. What is needed is a coldly scientific survey of the entire field of government expenditures, an actual reorganization of the administrative branches of the government and a distribution of the funds on a basis of actual needs and of the funds that are clearly available. Even the budget system would not give immediate relief. Congress must depend, as usual, on the estimates of the several departments, all of them eager to make a showing, all of them determined to get the uttermost farthing. Congress, it need not be doubted, means well, but then we all know where good intentions lead. It may be said also that we all know what must happen unless clear minds are brought to bear upon a situation involving a general contraction of credit, cessation of industry, bankruptcies, and unemployment.

Some Labor Leaders.

The proceedings conducted in New York by Samuel Untermyer and the Lockwood committee help us somewhat toward an understanding of the high price of building materials and the consequent dearth of houses. The conditions existing in New York, or other conditions analogous to them, may exist here and elsewhere. If so they can be removed without recourse to legislation such as the reckless laws passed in New York to remedy a situation supposed to be economic, but actually criminal.

There are about thirty building trades in New York and it seems that nearly all of them were in a conspiracy to raise the price of materials to famine point and to keep it there. But since labor was a factor in all these trades it was necessary to secure the complicity of the unions, and this was done through the agency of Robert Brindell, who had manoeuvred himself into the position of president of the Building Trades Council. Ostensibly exercising his functions as a champion of labor, as a protector of the workman against a conscienceless capitalism, Brindell seems impartially to have blackmailed both labor and capital. It has already been shown—and the proceedings are still young—that he received some $50,000 from building contractors, and we may expect to hear of a vastly larger sum when all the facts have been discovered. But Brindell was by no means satisfied with this spoiling of the Egyptians. Everything was fish that came to his net. A labor dollar looked just the same to him as any other, and so we read of a single small union that was forced to contribute $40,000 to Brindell's income. We are told that nearly every building trades union in New York was organized by Brindell and his associates—for there were others—as a source of revenue to themselves. By a cleverly devised system of officialism they built up a personal machine that gave them almost invincible strength. How this was done by an adroit process of affiliation and delegation need not here be recounted. It is enough that it was done, that the contractors and unions were impartially plundered, and that the long-suffering public went houseless and blamed the war for its misery.

The war is of course responsible for a vast amount of disorganization, chaos, and high prices. It is responsible also for the opportunity that it gave to the remorseless cupidity of combinations and to the rapacity of individuals who were quick to avail themselves of unrest and class antagonisms. The combinations are hard to resist. Their agreements are secret and usually unrecorded. They are often beyond the reach of the law and vulnerable only to the internal forces of competition that always come into play sooner or later. But the predatory labor leader is quite another matter. He is not only a thief, but a traitor. Without his connivance the contractors' combination would be nearly impossible. And his connivance can usually be lo-no matter how flagrant his treachery to his associates.

How comes it that the labor union is so prone to give its confidence to scoundrels? There has been a long dynasty of them, veritable Napoleons of blackmail such as the late Sam Parks. If they confined their depredations to the employer it would at least be comprehensible. But they do not. They plunder alike their friends and their supposed enemies. No one is exempt. They have flourished in New York, Chicago, and San Francisco, openly flaunting their wealth before the eyes of their victims, who must be quite well aware of at least one of its sources. The small union that paid $40,000 to Brindell must have wondered if they were getting value for their money. They must have known that they were not. Why was Brindell allowed to get such a strangle hold on the building trades unions? Why was he allowed to maintain it?

Labor unionism must know that it is on an ebbing tide, and it may well ask itself why an institution that ought to be beneficent to the whole community is fast approaching a point of execration. The answer is to be found in the quality of its leadership. There can be no real success without honest leadership. The public at large believes that a nefarious situation is indicated by the persistent choice of dishonest leaders, the apparent preference for pirates and highwaymen.

If one-half the energies devoted to corruptions and illegalities had been directed toward efficiencies and responsibilities the labor unions would now be enjoying, not only a universal respect, but a power and an authority sufficient for all their needs.

Psycho-Analyzing the President.

Is it actually true that we unveil our souls and display the hidden mechanism of our minds every time we make a speech or write a book? It has been said that speech was given to us in order that we might conceal our thoughts, but that cynicism will have to disappear if the psycho-analyst can sustain his claims.

Here is William Bayard Hale, for example, who analyzes for us the mind of President Wilson. Some of us will believe that Mr. Hale's task is now a superfluity, but then Mr. Hale's ways are not our ways, and his methods have all the charm of novelty. Moreover, we may learn to avoid the verbal pitfalls into which President Wilson heedlessly walked in his ignorance of psycho-analysis. To be forewarned is to be forearmed.

What does it mean when a speaker or a writer shows a marked preference for a particular letter of the alphabet? Frankly, we do not know, but the curious reader will find all about in Mr. Hale's book, "The Story of a Style." In the case of the President it seems always to mean something disagreeable.

Take, for instance, the letter p. We can not get along entirely without it. But it should be used prudently, and only under proper pressure of propriety. Otherwise there may be invidious inferences. The President, it seems, in the course of a page or so uses the words "processes," "unprecedented operations," "proud punctilios," "preserve without passion," "poisoned purposes," "profess fair play," "purchase peace by passionless processes." This means something dark. So does the excessive use of the v sound, as in "very," "veritable," "vital," "voices," "vitality of a various people," etc.

The President, says Mr. Hale, suffers from "inhibited cerebration," which sounds serious. Hence the p's and the v's. Hence the surplus adjectives, the dodged verbs, the effort after superlatives, the repetition for forty years of a few favorite phrases, the alliterations, the rhymes, the puns, the trailing echo of sounds for page after page. The President is never frank, but "very frank." He speaks of the "very absolute," and the "most universal," and the "absolutely essential." On a single page he tells us of "black darkness," "damp mists," and "slimy mud." The President, says Mr. Hale, does not search for thoughts. He searches for words. Sounds become the substitutes for cerebration.

Now all of these things are evidence that the President is constantly trying to retreat from real life. We do not know why they show it, but they do. Psycho-analysis says so. Thus, and by way of confirmation, we are reminded that the President had a daily movie show in his house, that he is interested in the number 13, that he asks himself rhetorical questions because he shrinks from asking them of any one else, that he conducts mock debates with himself because he is unwilling to match his mind with others. It is this same inhibited cerebration that leads the President into mistakes. He confuses Poland and Roumania, Prague and Warsaw, supposes Bagdad to be in Persia, runs the Bagdad Railroad through countries far away from its track, confuses Gladstone with Bryce, and assassinates Franz Ferdinand in Serbia instead of Austria.

Now all this is portentous, and particularly the persisting preference for the letter p. How shall we conceal our thoughts if they are to be unconsciously betrayed in such ways as this? Must we all study psycho-analysis in order to circumvent the wiles thus brought against us to our undoing? But then life would be hardly worth living.

What Does Japan Mean?

Our relations with Japan are by no means what they should be, and this may be said with none the less certainty because of the vague and contradictory reports that reach us from Washington as to the construction of the new treaty. It is said that an agreement had been reached by which civil but not political rights were to be accorded to Japanese now in America, but that the Japanese government had suddenly shifted its grounds and demanded all the rights of naturalization. Now the rights of naturalization can not be granted by treaty, even supposing that there were a wish to grant them. They can be granted only by act of Congress, but none the less we are told that the Japanese government is likely to insist and is even prepared to abandon the treaty altogether. We are told also that the restriction of immigration forms no part of the treaty, but that it is provided for by a new "gentleman's agreement."

Now we can consider this matter from two different points of view, and while we may choose which we will, perhaps the really important point is to determine which one has been selected by the Japanese government. We may regard the matter as one that hinges entirely upon naturalization and immigration and therefore to be determined in the usual diplomatic ways. Or we may ask ourselves whether Japan is pursuing a great world policy of which the present conflict of view is a provocative or an aggressive part. If the latter question is to be answered in the affirmative, then we have a situation of which it would be hard to exaggerate the gravity. And we are in no way reassured when we find a statesman such as Count Okuma openly advocating force. In August, 1914, the world awoke from its dream of peace to find itself suddenly and tremendously at war, and from causes of which it knew practically nothing. At least we should now have learned not to describe possibilities as "impossibilities," nor to say that those things are "unthinkable" of which a great many people are seriously thinking. We may remember also that if the attitude of Japan toward America is a part of some greater world plan it is obviously futile to discuss the merits of the situation or to rely on the abstract justice of our own contentions. At once they become irrelevant.

To suppose that Japan is intent upon schemes of reconstruction or that she is dreaming of the idealisms that even with us are now growing a little dim is obviously futile. Japan is doing nothing of the sort. Japan is Asiatic, and no one knows better than Japan that the white and the colored races are now aligning themselves for a contest that must surely come when that alignment is complete. It may be in a year or in a century, but it will come, and events just now are moving fast. When that day shall be upon us Japan intends to be its leader. She can not be blamed for so great a racial aspiration. We, on our part, may have to blame ourselves if we look too steadily at small things, at localisms, when the real issues lie so much further afield. What we have to consider is the ultimate motive behind Japanese policies.

We seem to get glimpses of that motive from more than one quarter. It may be that we misinterpret them, but at least we should open our eyes wide enough to include whatever is visible. For example, we have some reason to believe that Japan fostered the Russian revolution and even gave money for its advancement, that she tried to produce an outbreak in Bengal in 1912, that upon more than one occasion she has been by no means a pacific influence between America and Mexico, that she tried to prevent the ousting of the Manchurian dynasty in China and the establishment of a Chinese Republic, that in 1912 she provoked the Chinese against foreigners, and that upon more than one occasion she has tried to produce a revolution in China. All these things and many more are set forth by Mr. A. M. Pooley in his "Japan's Foreign Policies," and it may be said that Mr. Pooley has high reputation as a student of Asiatic affairs, and that his previous book, "Japan at the Cross Roads," was banned by the Japanese government. Mr. Pooley—writing, of course, some months ago—says, "That Japan would ever risk a war with America appears inconceivable, but the conditions between the two countries are frankly strained, and if Japan should persist in aggression and America should persist in maintaining her point of view, matters might slip beyond the limits of diplomatic handling." Mr. Pooley believes that there was definite danger of war in 1913. It would be interesting to know his opinion today. Is Japan persisting in aggression? Is America maintaining her point of view? We can partially answer those questions by a study of the bulletins from Washington, of such speeches as that of Count Okuma, and of the inflammatory state of Japanese newspapers and Japanese crowds.

How would Japan be likely to regard the insurrectionary movements now rife throughout Asia, movements created and fostered by the explosive idea of self-determination? Would she favor those movements or frown upon them? Perhaps it does not matter much which she would do so long as she was prepared to recognize facts and avail herself of them. Even if she discouraged them she must know that she can not stop them, and that almost at any moment there may be a conflagration throughout Asia Minor, India, and Africa. Would she be likely to remain inert, inactive, with Asia in flames and clamoring for a leader? Her domination of China is nearly complete, and we may remember that China, too, is Asiatic and would assuredly be sensitive to any Asiatic thrill. We may hug the delusion as much as we please that China loves us because of the Boxer indemnity and that Japan loves us because of Commodore Perry. We are not loved anywhere in Asia, nor is any other white race. Asia for the Asiatics is now a reality. If there should be an alignment of Asiatic races we should find China standing in that line. We need have no doubts about that.

Certainly it is not likely that Japan would deliberately provoke a war with America over a quarrel in which the rights are so obviously against her. None the less she may think that she has much to gain by asserting herself against the greatest white power in the world and so making a spectacular bid for Asiatic leadership. It may be that there are some European powers, jealous of the strength of Japan, who would be by no means unwilling to edge her into a war with America in order thereby to encompass her downfall. Nor must we forget—no nation can now afford to forget—the power of the crowd, and the Japanese crowd seems to be growing more bitter every day. So do the Japanese newspapers.

The Argonaut is not alarmist. None the less it might be well for us to think a little less of "local issues," land tenure, immigration, and the like, and to consider both America and Japan as participants in a world convulsion of which the end is not yet, and which presents extraordinary opportunities to national ambitions and racial animosities.

The Red Victory in Russia.

The merchants of both America and Great Britain are anxious to trade with Russia, but there can be no trade on a large scale without official recognition of the Bolshevik government. Without such recognition there can be no embassies, no trade agreements, no consular services. Great Britain, if we may believe the bulletin of the State Department at Washington, is about to swallow the pill and officially recognize the Soviet power. America refuses to do so while Lenin and Trotsky remain on deck. As a result Great Britain expects to do an enormous trade with Russia, of which a large part under more normal circumstances would come to America.

But it is not only on trade lines that Great Britain expects to benefit from the recognition of Russia. At the present time Red emissaries are pervading Asia Minor, Egypt, India, and Great Britain herself, doing their best to foment revolution and trouble of every sort. Russia promises to recall all these agents and to discontinue her insurrectionary efforts in return for recognition.

Such are the facts, and we may speculate as much as we please as to their results upon the Red movement throughout the world. Russia may now claim to have crushed all her internal foes, Baron Wrangel being the last of a somewhat long list. She may claim to have established the Red régime throughout the length and breadth of Russia and to have demonstrated herself as a going concern. She may claim to have compelled the recognition of the greatest of the European powers. What will be the result elsewhere of such successes as these? Can it be believed that Russia will keep her promise to recall her missionaries? It is certainly strange, to say the least of it, that Lloyd George should have been denouncing Russia as incorrigibly faithless a few months ago and that today he should be accepting Russian pledges as though they were the ark of the covenant.

Editorial Notes.

It is hard to say whether the Socialists will be pleased or displeased by the results of the elections. It is an open secret that they hoped to poll three million votes, and there were a good many of us who feared that they might do so. But the total Socialist vote was only 1,800,000, a total that fell short of expectations, but that is none the less three times the Socialist vote of 1916 and twice the Socialist vote for 1912. Meyer London won back the congressional seat that he lost in 1916, but on the other hand Victor Berger was rejected by Milwaukee after his two victories of 1918 and 1919. Apart from the total Socialist vote for President there is nothing in the Socialist campaign beyond the usual gains and losses incidental to all elections and that leave the matter, so far as Socialism is concerned, pretty much where it was before.

It is a pity that dirty linen should be washed in public, whether the washing be national or individual. At the present time Foch seems to be making charges against Clemenceau and to be doing it so effectually as to turn public opinion strongly against the ex-premier. Details are still lacking, but among other interesting statements it seems that the request for a unified command originated with the British and that Clemenceau not only resisted the idea, but resisted also the appointment of Foch himself to the supreme control. Dirty linen is never an edifying spectacle, but perhaps its display is necessary to the accuracy of history. It seems so in this case.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

"Poland: The Opera Bouffe of 'Self-Determination!'"

SAN FRANCISCO, November 22, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: We heard these words in a crowded street-car yesterday, and were struck with their appositeness. All through its long, blood-stained history, clean down to the present, Poland has had, at long intervals, some son or daughter, acting alone and by their own proper authority as Mr. Wilson would say, to sustain the opera bouffe character of her political life. She has produced a heggarily handful of soldiers of fortune, one of whom saved Vienna from the Turks and one who endeared himself to the American colonies. She has brought forth a musician and a singer of prominence, and lastly a brace of romance-historians. Upon this slender talk has been erected a tremendous superstructure compounded of idealism, exaggeration, and simon-pure romance.

Of schools, of any effort for the uplift of the vast submerged 9 per cent. of her population, we read not a word. Of the three normal divisions of society in "barbarous Europe," mazing to relate, we read nothing: the only grade of society that existed, or exists, in Poland is the "Democratic Nobility." r, if you please, the "Noble Democracy." This riddle has been explained by a recent writer in the Geographic. Poland," he avers, "was a republic of land-owners in which the serf (peasant) did not count. The man who owned land, r whose ancestors owned land, was a noble. He might match overy for poorness, he might not have a single sole between is feet and the ground, he might have only a rusty old sword o tie to his girdle and only a pie-bald blind horse to drive, nd that a hired one, but he was still a noble if ownership of ind had ever set its approving stamp upon him or his mily. * * * With him peasants were but as worms of the ust. The Russian noble was proud of his peasants, the erman noble was proud of his, and the Austrian noble had ut words of praise for his; but the Polish noble was not roud of his. * * * The Polish peasant ekes out a bard xistence. He lives in a log hut thatched with straw; he eakfasts, dines, and makes his supper of porridge, washing down with poor brandy; and in general leads a life full of ant and empty of pleasure. * * * The nobles' estates are the owned outright by absentees or controlled by them rough full-value mortgages, and they have combined to rce down the peasant farmers' share, with the result that e 'quently goes down to one-twelfth, a wage of slow starva-on, giving rise to a disease of lowered nutrition, the 'Plica olonica.'"

Twenty cents per diem for a long day's work in the salt ines, where men live and die and grow blind from long clusion from daylight; about the same wretched stipend for e gifted artisan who labors at strictly hand work in War-w, Cracow, and Lemberg. Think of that, you bloated ionists! The peasant rises at daybreak and with his wife its in a full day on the farm. If she is unusually active id strong the peasant is congratulated by his neighbors for iving married a "horse." When the baby girl matures, a tle hand is penciled on the door panel, indicating that a isband is wanted within!

This is Poland, the land of Sobieski, of Kosciusko—and a w others.

It will be the privilege of the future historian to depict two e "Wilsonized" nations of this epoch, one lifted to uring fame by a poet, the other by a musician.

NELSON SCOFIELD GIBERSON.

THE AMERICAN PRESS.

It is always interesting, if not always pleasant, to see ourselves as others see us. We may not be disposed to accept the accuracy of the vision. We may even resent what we think to be a caricature. None the less there is a certain delicate compliment even in a caricature, since it is better to be misrepresented than to be unnoticed.

But there is neither caricature nor misrepresentation in the survey of "The American Press" contributed by Albert Schinz to Revue Bleue. M. Schinz sees, or thinks he sees, a downward tendency in the American monthly and an upward tendency in the American daily. The monthlies are lowering their standards to reach a wider public, while the dailies, in many notable instances, are developing what may be called an American torism. There are, of course, some important newspapers still bent on the downward path and always ready to trim their sails to the breeze:

Then we have the great yellow newspapers of former times, the New York World and the New York American, of which only the second still merits that epithet. Thanks to the pernicious power of Mr. Hearst's money there is now a chain of these nauseating sheets, the New York American, Boston American, Chicago American, San Francisco American, and so on. These pander to the lowest tastes of the public, with stories of crimes and scandals and poisonous political propaganda. Hearst put his millions at the service of the Kaiser, doubtless hoping thus to promote his personal ambition. Save for these last exceptions, the condition of the American press is, taking everything into consideration, encouraging. During periods like the present, thinking for its own sake is a luxury. A lowering in the standards of American reviews is merely a relative evil, while the efforts of the daily papers, which reach the great mass of readers, to deal seriously with the public problems of the day are a source of congratulation.

But it is the New York weeklies that demand the larger share of the French writer's attention, the "organs of the intellectuals," as he calls them. M. Schinz tries to account for them and to ascribe to them their true value in American journalism:

Americans rate self-control above all other mental habits. It was the quality they admired among us French during the war. This feeling did as much as the atrocities of the Kaiser's army to make them despise the fanaticism and obstinacy of the pan-Germans. Now this admiration for self-control, which made these weeklies pioneers in advocating America's entering the war, made them the first to turn against the Allies after the war. When America became enthusiastic for the Entente cause, they ceased to see the cause in their disapproval of the enthusiasm. As soon as the nation was carried away by its feelings, they assumed it must be wrong; and soon their dislike for emotion turned them against the Allies themselves.

The "organs of the intellectuals" felt it always incumbent upon them to oppose the popular feeling and to range themselves on the side of what they supposed to be the superior minority:

At the time of the armistice there were three of these intellectual weeklies: The New York Nation, the venerable organ of American intellectuals; the New Republic, a much younger paper, aspiring to be more independent than its conservative colleague, and the Dial, which had just moved, from Chicago to New York to join the chorus of its confrères. None of the members of this incredible trio, inspired chiefly with a desire of not thinking like other people, has troubled to take the precaution to escape the charge of deserting the cause of the victorious Allies in order to embrace that of conquered Germany or the Bolsheviks. At times there seems a real emulation of madness among them. Their editors have forgotten entirely the violation of Belgium's neutrality, the atrocities committed by German troops in conquered countries, the Lusitania—and all they see now is the suffering of the poor Germans and the harsh terms of the treaty.

M. Schinz reminds us that the Nation was unfriendly to France in 1870, although some ten or twelve years before the war it changed its aspect in this respect and in August, 1914, it took up the cudgels vigorously against Germany:

Two or three years later rumors became current of discord in the management. The responsible editor resigned. A few days later there was a sudden shift of scene. Mr. Villard, who is of German descent, and who, although he might conceal his real sympathies for a time, was not disposed to dissimulate his hostility to the Allies, assumed active management of the periodical, as his financial control permitted him to do. He employed as editor a visionary Tolstoian pacifist, who served admirably to disguise his own views in the public eye with a veil of disinterested idealism. Soon after the armistice Mr. Villard secured from the Washington Foreign Office a passport—which could not well be refused without appearing to muzzle the press—and left for Europe. He wrote back articles inspired by a spirit of contemptible enmity for the diplomats of Quai d'Orsay, convened in their sumptuous over-decorated palace apartments, and chanted in contrast the austere virtue and spirit of fair play which reigned in the sessions of the Internationalist Social Congress at Bern, with its simple quarters and democratic atmosphere.

Since the Nation has gone from had to worse. Is this due to sympathy for Germany, to mere blindness, or to malice? We do not attempt to answer. It is a most unhappy situation, that's all. However, we need not get excited over this outrageous campaign against us. The bias of the paper is too evident to any intelligent man—and the Nation addresses itself to the intelligent public. The government understands the case. When the Nation gets too bad it suppresses some of its issues. We might cite numbers where there is hardly a line that is not written in spirit of malice. Perhaps we should add that far from advocating the real sentiment of America, the Nation's attacks upon the Allies prove rather that the public opinion of the country is on our side. It is the very futility of its efforts which makes the Nation froth at the mouth. The fact that its circulation has grown largely since the war is due in the first place to its vigorous campaign to secure new subscribers, and in the second place to the fact that, in addition to its political columns, it has literary and scientific sections which maintain a high standard. Furthermore, it publishes really interesting documents relating to the war. It has printed a great deal upon Russia. Many people buy the Nation to obtain original facts about Bolshevism; not because they are supporters of that movement, but often in order to combat it more intelligently.

M. Schinz then turns his attention to the New Re- public, which, he reminds us, is financed by a wealthy lady who desired to see in America a publication unhampered by financial cares and representing the intellectual élite. Its staff embraces several writers of real talent, but they are all characterized by a peculiar absence of national sentiment:

At the outset the New Republic was naturally quite agreed that the monster of pan-Germanism must be crushed. Since that was the popular attitude at the moment, it favored the initial success of this journal. But when Mr. Lippmann and his friends discovered that, in addition to German patriotism, there was also a British patriotism, they reversed their attitude. In this case, too, many Americans supported their course. However, their main object of attack is French nationalism; not because they distrust it more than any other form of patriotism, but simply because America had shown more unreserved enthusiasm for France, and French patriotism has stood in better repute with them than any other—excepting, of course, their native American jingoism. The efforts of this journal to combat America's enthusiasm for France commenced as early as 1917, when Messieurs Viviani and Joffre made their triumphal visit to the country. From that time onward it charged France with asking too much of America. It then took the position that the war ought not to be prolonged merely for Alsace-Lorraine. After the armistice its editors were in the front rank of those who refused to understand France's position, and unblushingly rang the changes upon the charge of imperialism against Clemenceau and Foch. Possibly we are misled. However, we can not avoid suspecting that the editors had a better understanding of the real state of affairs in Europe than they allowed to be seen, but that they simulated this ignorance, so unfortunate for America's European Allies, in order to forward their own ideas more successfully.

The New Republic, says the French critic, has at least one advantage over the Nation. It knows what it wants. To judge by what the Nation prints, it would like to see world-wide anarchy for the benefit of Germany:

The New Republic is perfectly clear as to its two great articles of faith. It is definitely opposed to the peace treaty, on the theory that reconstruction is impossible until the nations of Europe renounce their national sentiment in favor of a neutrality, and become completely neutral in spirit, even though Germany may profit by such a course. In the second place, the New Republic is definitely in favor of the league of nations, which it believes can be made to remedy the gross blunders in the treaty. We may add that the New Republic has done a real service in insisting that America should understand Europe better, and in preaching the doctrine that America has as much need of Europe, particularly of European markets, as Europe has of America.

M. Schinz finally turns his attention to the Dial, which has changed its headquarters from Chicago to New York. From the first the Dial has been a vigorous opponent of American friendship for the Entente:

Its chief complaint against the Administration is identical with that of the Nation and the New Republic; that Wilson promised a peace in accordance with the fourteen points, and did not give the country the peace he promised. The Dial is not troubled by the fact that Wilson was not the only person at the conference table in Versailles. There is a shade of difference between this paper and the two we have just mentioned. The Dial is less antagonistic to France than to England. England is the real enemy. The peace treaty forces America to guarantee the safety of the British Empire, but why should this be? The United States can get along without the British Empire; so let that empire get along without the United States. We believe the editors of this journal are honest, but it seems to us quite possible that they have unconsciously fallen under the influence of pro-German propaganda.

M. Schinz does not believe that these weeklies have much influence. He suspects them to be poseurs. Editors who have strong causes do not get excited. They do not foam at the mouth. M. Schinz seems to think that these particular editors would soon change their tone if they should find themselves on the side of the majority. Their policy is to be in opposition, to lead minorities, to represent quality rather than quantity, and to persuade themselves of intellectual excellences which perhaps are more apparent to themselves than to their readers.

In December, 1882, a black boy, seventeen years old, was trying to make his way back to his home and birthplace at Union, West Virginia, from Toledo, Ohio, where he had been a laborer on public works and in coal mines, but he decided to spend Christmas in Charleston. The chief reason that impelled him to stop at the latter town was because he ran out of funds at that point. Instead of waiting for a position, he took the first job which presented itself—that of dishwasher at the Hale House. On the princely wage of $2 a week he soon was enabled to proceed on his way. The boy who found means to make his way at seventeen has succeeded in making his way ever since. On May 20, 1920, he was elected by the recent general conference at Des Moines, Iowa, by 569 votes out of a total of 734 votes cast, a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the highest honor that can come to a minister of that faith. On Sunday, May 23, 1920, Matthew Wesley Clair, former dishwasher at the Hale House, was consecrated to that high and holy office, and he is now performing the duties of that exalted station. That black boy who had been so signally honored was never a wild, reckless lad. He was born at Union, in Monroe County, West Virginia, October 21, 1865.

BLASCO IBANEZ IN SPANISH EYES.

The Heraldo de Madrid prints an article on Blasco Ibañez by Carlos De Batlle and it is translated by the Living Age, perhaps as evidence that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country:

In the United States they call him Mr. Ibañez, because they can not understand why a man should have two family names. They see how a person might be called Astor, Carnegie, Blasco, or Ibañez, but they do not approach such prodigality as Astor Carnegie or Blasco Ibañez.

This custom of using both family names is a whim peculiar to old peoples who have an ineradicable tendency to make everything as complex as possible, even to the names of individuals.

So in North America, which is the country of simplicity par excellence, men have to content themselves with a single name, and so they have suppressed the Blasco of our novelist and call him simply Mr. Ibañez.

At first glance I may seem to be trite with this subject, but it has its significance. Our Blasco Ibañez has succeeded in gaining the attention of a nation which ordinarily believes itself too busy to devote more than three weeks to any one celebrity.

It is a miraculous achievement to have inspired a real and general interest in the Yankee people. Blasco Ibañez, or Mr. Ibañez, as you please, has accomplished this. Today he is more popular, more generally talked about, perhaps more highly rated in the United States than in Spain itself.

For Spain—we are and always have been slaves to tradition—always selects the moment when one of its sons has broken out from the formidable triangle made by the three streets of the Alcala, Sevilla, and Carrera de San Jerónimo, and is winning triumphs beyond the frontier both for himself and for his native land, to "take him down" and to discover faults in him which no one had previously detected.

This has happened so many times before that it is no novelty in the case of the great Valencian novelist.

His popularity began to decline in Spain—among professional writers rather than the public in general—as soon as France began to pay attention to his works. Every time that one of his books proved a best seller in France and established more firmly his reputation—and likewise that of his native country—some alert and shrewd critic was sure to start up at home, raising a cry of alarm, extending his hands in deprecation, and endeavoring to prevent his innocent fellow-countrymen from falling into the track of foreign adulation.

These pious laborers, these gestures of disapproval, these bursts of righteous wrath in which their authors sometimes tried to disguise their sentiment in a mask of irony, are due to very transparent motives. All our great writers have suffered from the same source. Valera, Palacio Valdés, Galdós, and Picon owe their personal reputation and that of their works mainly to foreign critics. When France and England began to admire them, our own people at home started to disparage them. As soon as other countries read their works, adopted them into their literary circles, chanted their praises, and recognized the strain of genius in their works, their own countrymen tried to show that the time had come to withdraw their books from circulation and to relegate the authors to the pension list.

So Vicente Blasco Ibañez, the author of such purely Spanish novels as "La Barraca," "La Bodega," and "La Cathedral," has had the misfortune to achieve, while still in the prime of life and the fullness of his productive powers, a greater reputation outside of Spain than in his native country. Indeed his foreign fame is almost intimidating.

Certainly there is not in France a single well-read gentleman who does not know his name and admire his works. In the United States he has been welcomed with triumphal honors. The degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon him at the same time as upon General Pershing. The Chicago Tribune has paid him two thousand dollars for a story. A great syndicate of journals, publishing six hundred thousand issues daily, has engaged an article from him every week. Both in Spain and outside of Spain there are many people who are studying Spanish and learning the language merely to read his stories in their native tongue.

For my part I hold the opinion that any man who raises the reputation of Spain abroad deserves the gratitude of his fellow-countrymen. That gratitude is due a Spaniard whose love for his country is only strengthened by his absence from it. It is evident that the world is now curious to see what comes out of Spain, and it is but a short step from curiosity to sympathy and interest.

Spanish is even more studied than French today in the United States and England. France is devoting itself with enthusiasm to the study of our language, and the intellectual movements of our country are receiving respectful consideration. All this is due mainly to the interest and admiration which men like the elder Valera, Palacio Valdés, and Blasco Ibañez have inspired for our literature and language. In the course of the present season in Paris, French translations of ten of Blasco Ibañez' works will be published. This means that during the season the whole French press will be occupied on at least ten occasions, not only with Blasco Ibañez, but with Spain and Spanish literature and intellectual movements.

Naturally there will also be ten occasions when the Spanish press will feel called upon to publish long articles, endeavoring to show that it is a great mistake to pay so much attention to the works of Blasco Ibañez; attention which could be more profitably devoted to other Spanish efforts.

OLD FAVORITES.

The Lady of Shalott.

On either side the river lie
Long fields of barley and of rye,
That clothe the wold and meet the sky;
And thro' the field the road runs by
To many-tower'd Camelot;
And up and down the people go,
Gazing where the lilies blow
Round an island there below,
The island of Shalott.

Willows whiten, aspens quiver,
Little breezes dusk and shiver
Thro' the wave that runs for ever
By the island in the river
Flowing down to Camelot.
Four gray walls, and four gray towers,
Overlook a space of flowers,
And the silent isle embowers
The Lady of Shalott.

By the margin, willow-veil'd,
Slide the heavy barges trail'd
By slow horses; and unhail'd
The shallop flitteth silken-sail'd
Skimming down to Camelot:
But who hath seen her wave her hand?
Or at the casement seen her stand?
Or is she known in all the land,
The Lady of Shalott?

Only reapers, reaping early
In among the hearded barley,
Hear a song that echoes cheerly
From the river winding clearly,
Down to tower'd Camelot:
And by the moon the reaper weary,
Piling sheaves in uplands airy,
Listening, whispers "'Tis the fairy Lady of Shalott."

—Lord Tennyson.

A Child's Laughter.

All the bells of heaven may ring,
All the birds of heaven may sing,
All the wells on earth may spring,
All the winds on earth may bring
All sweet sounds together;
Sweeter far than all things heard,
Hand of harper, tone of bird,
Sound of woods at sundawn stirred,
Welling water's winsome word,
Wind in warm weather.

One thing yet there is, that none
Hearing ere its chime be done
Knows not well the sweetest one
Heard of man beneath the sun,
Hoped in heaven hereafter;
Soft and strong and loud and light,
Very sound of very light,
Heard from morning's rosiest height,
When the soul of all delight
Fills a child's clear laughter.

Golden bells of welcome rolled Never forth such notes, nor told
Hours so lithe in tones so bold,
As the radiant mouth of gold
Here that rings forth heaven.
If the golden-crested wren
Were a nightingale—why, then,
Something seen and heard of men
Might he half as sweet as when Laughs a child of seven.
—Algernon Charles Swinburne.

One of the latest aspirants for "screen" honors is Miss Margaret Beecher. Her grandfather was Henry Ward Beecher, celebrated preacher, author, editor, anti-slavery reformer. Her great-aunt was Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, creator of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Her father, another Henry Ward Beecher, was captain of the '87 Yale football team. When the great ambition struck in Miss Beecher had finished the last of a series of fashionable girls' boarding-schools. There was nothing very thrilling in a boarding-school for a girl who had spent her summers in a boys' camp in Canada, where she played shortstop on the baseball nine and substitute left tackle on the football team. A few years before, up at Lake Placid, she had been the leader of a gang of "mountaineers" who prowled the highways and lived by stealth. Her qualifications for the screen, as she listed them herself, included stenography, shorthand, a working knowledge in French, elementary Latin, mediæval history, and plane geometry. But not many motion-picture people were interested until they began to hear that she could ride the worst-tempered horse in the paddock, do a double somersault off the top rung of the ladder on the diving floor, swim any distance easily, turn a cartwheel, play any game a boy could play, and never refuse a dare.

Miss Belle Skinner of Holyoke, Massachusetts, who knows France, France's spirit, and the stolid capabilities of French peasants as well as any one American woman, enjoys the unique distinction of having adopted an entire French village. American blood has enriched the soil around Hattonchatel in the Valley of the Meuse, and in memory of this villagers there know Miss Skinner perhaps better than her neighbors in Holyoke. She is the "Marraine" in person to her charges. A half-million francs of her money has thus far gone to help the peasants of Hattonchatel.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

General Ludendorff, who commanded more than 7,000,000 men in the German armies during the war, is now a private in the Bavarian home guard.

Purple is the favorite color of Elinor Glyn, the well-known novelist. When at home she does most of her writing in a room with purple walls and a purple carpet.

Mrs. Edward Bell, wife of the secretary to the United States Embassy at Tokyo, has been formally appointed to the important diplomatic post of counsellor to the embassy.

In addition to a knowledge of Malay, Queen Wilhelmina of the Netherlands speaks French, German, and English as fluently as her native Dutch, and she also knows something of Italian and Russian.

Premier Witos of Poland is a peasant who was put into the position as a figurehead when the Russian advance threatened Warsaw. He likes the job, however, and his shrewdness and keenness have caused the failure of several attempts to oust him.

The recent matriculation at Columbia University, New York, of Edward R. Hardy, at the age of twelve, drew a lot of attention to the lad. The boy, who is the son of Professor Edward R. Hardy, started to school at the age of three and entered high school when eight. It is said that he speaks twelve languages, but is a wholesome American lad, fond of games and athletics.

A busy life has been spent by Samuel M. Babcock, inventor of the Babcock milk-testing device, in laboratory investigation. He was born in New York and educated in Tufts College. For a time he was an instructor at Cornell, but in 1887 joined the staff of the University of Wisconsin. Age has not dimmed his youthful ardor for scientific investigation. Retired as an emeritus professor in 1913, he has continued his work as actively as before.

William B. Miller of Bath, New York, thinks he was the youngest soldier in the Union army during the civil war. In 1861, when he was eleven years old, he ran away from home and became a drummer boy with the First North Carolina Volunteers, a regiment composed of Union men. He served five months with this regiment, and then became a drummer with the Tenth New York Volunteer Infantry, with which he served during the war. He was fourteen years old when he was discharged at the grand review in Washington in 1865.

Mrs. William Haskell of Albany, New York, wife of Colonel Haskell of the old Sixty-Ninth Infantry and relief administrator in Armenia, has returned to this country with a thrilling story of her experience with bandits in the Black Sea. She was on the steamer Sourfirah between Batum and Constantinople when bandits, who had hidden themselves on board, captured the ship. Hearing shots, Mrs. Haskell concealed her valuables, and when the bandits forced their way into her stateroom she told them she was penniless and thus saved her property. The brigands forced the ship's crew to lower boats in which they could escape.

One's charm of personality depends, to a large extent, upon the originality of one's likes and dislikes. Perhaps that is one of the chief reasons that W. L. George is so interesting. For instance, Mr. George likes Joseph Conrad, whom he considers the greatest English novelist of the century; he likes orange Angora cats, of which he has two; and he likes his wife, a truly beautiful woman of the finest English type, whose personality justifies the application of the much-abused term "cultured." Then Mr. George dislikes Gilbert Cannan, especially his profile, although he admits that Cannan has written one great novel; he dislikes poetry in any form; and American prudishness.

The French have their Marguerite Audoux, who turned from dressmaking to literature; we have our Mary Antin and our Anzia Yezierska, who emerged from ghettos and sweatshops to fame and competence as writers, and now England has her Ellen Fowkes, a Manchester stenographer and typist, who has produced an English best seller. During week-ends and evenings she has been busy with a novel dealing with Indian frontier life, full of local color and wonderfully accurate. Miss Fowkes has never been to India, and explains her knowledge by a possible previous existence in India. For those who find this explanation difficult we should add that her father, who knew India well, may have told her stories which she remembers.

Saving the lives of hundreds of babies and small children throughout the United States by raising milk goats as a diversion from his law business is the unique pastime of W. F. Reeves of Marshall, Kansas, in the foothills of the Ozark Mountains. Mr. Reeves has found time during his eight years' experience to build up one of the finest and largest herds of milk goats in the country. There is an enormous demand for them because of the strengthening qualities of their milk. I is so great, in fact, that Mr. Reeves disposes of his animals almost exclusively to parents of weak and sickly babies. He has never advertised, yet he can not supply one-tenth of the calls that come to him. Most of the inquiries are from references furnished by the United States Department of Agriculture.

MEMORABLE VERSES.

Professor Charles Mills Gayley Comments on the Poetry of John L. McLane, Jr.

In these days of poetasters, toying with empty forms and the ordered or disordered "chatter of their schools" and only too often babbling "with dark amazement of the crimes committed in the gutter," a voice that sings of thoughts eternal in accents hallowed by the experience of the ages is a boon. Such a voice, both of indignant protest and of thanksgiving for the bread and wine

That Beauty of her wisdom bountiful Sets forth before the poet and the sage, we welcome in the lyrics of John L. McLane, Jr. ("Spindrift": The Four Seas Company, Boston, 1920). Mr. McLane's verses, redolent of the classics, disciplined but spontaneous, passionate but thoughtful, are suffused with divination of the shifting moods of nature, of the glooms of human frailty and the wonder and worth of sympathy and sacrifice, above all of the dream that man can not destroy:

Man with his hands has slain
Much that was good and fair;
Yet from his blood and pain
Beauty shall spring again
With star-dust in her hair;
Beauty, man can not slay, for she
Is mother of eternity!

This quest of beauty—actual or ideal—was the inspiration of the lyricist's "Driftwood," written when he was but nineteen years of age; now that he is twenty the pursuit is renewed. But, before the manuscript of the present little book has left his hands, the heart of the lad is riven with sorrow—and beauty alone can not redress. What he had dreamed to be the source and fulfillment of spiritual endeavor is discovered in fact and by feeling, if not by reason, to be but an adumbration of reality. Now he knows that our light of life, ideal beauty, is but the shadow of something unbeheld; that only through the portal of death, the blackness of intimate darkness, may we win to Beauty undying and behold her—that she is not the "mother of eternity," but the radiance, the grace, of the veritable mother, "the grace of Love that no long shadow can efface"—of Love, always travelling, always creative, whose ways are Wisdom and whose heart, immortal Hope.

The lad has drunk sorrow to the dregs. The friend to whom he had addressed thirteen of these poems (pages 118 to 132), revelatory of the "communion such as friendship brings,"

Hours of friendship such as we Have stolen from eternity, the friend of whom he had in a moment of loneliness, numbness, and yearning written,

And yet I sought you, sought you once again
Over the windy meadows dumb with snow. . . .
I thought to find you never, when at last
I found you—the brief pressure of your hand—
The deep, clear light of friendship in your eyes—
And all the waves of darkness, troubled, vast,
Large-sounding waters moaning on the sand
Of my dead days, ebb'd—and the mysteries
Of this your simple friendship thrilled me through
With all the tender lovingness of you:

the friend whom, poetwise, he had adored almost as much for his beauty and surpassing charm as for intellectual power and moral ascendancy, is dead.

On the night of February 20, 1920, Charles MacVeagh, Jr., lost his life in a New Hampshire snowstorm on the summit of Mt. Monadnock. Brilliant, scholarly, clear of vision, independent and forceful in thought, the soul of tenderness and humor, of poetry and manly courage, of endeavor spiritual and practical, a youth of remarkable promise and purpose and unfolding opportunity—the starry certitude of his twenty-three years is eclipsed. In a memorable series of elegiac verses the young McLane pours forth his grief.

Now, of the poetry of personal bereavement there are three main kinds: the rebellious and futile lament; the lament that accepts with fortitude, but as without hope; the lament that converts disaster into more than temporal courage, into assurance of eternal gain. Long ago in twin epigrams Plato crystallized for succeeding ages this last, the spiritual motif—the cry of the heart wounded by the beauty and brevity of things mortal, the prevision of solace indestructible. These little elegies are the apotheosis of grief tempered by tranquil consideration of the mutability of life, the immutability of Something divined that not only justifies the contradictions of earthly existence, but sanctions the age-old yearning for continuing personality and renewed communion of souls beyond the grave. In the better known of the epigrams Plato celebrates the immutability. The verses are translated by Shelley:

Thou wert the morning star among the living,
Ere thy fair light had fled;
Now, having died, thou art as Hesperus giving
New splendor to the dead,— and in the Greek they are prefixed by that poet to his matchless lament for Keats. The less known epigram,

Now thou desierest the stars, my Star,
Ah, me—
Would I were Heaven with many eyes
To gaze on thee!

is Plato's hyperbole of the triumphant reunion that in his dialogues he had asserted and so valiantly striven to prove. This hope of triumph indestructible, translated into religious faith by the Alexandrian and the Christian literatures of the Hebrews—so different from the mourning that will not be comforted—is the theme of transcendent elegy in modern times. It glorifies Dante's verses on the death of Beatrice and the sonnets of Michelangelo. It glorifies the French poetry of bereavement and the English from the fourteenth-century Pearl through Spenser and Milton to Browning, Tennyson, and Arnold's "Rugby Chapel."

This faith, though not phrased in terms of any sectarian discipline, is the burden of the threnody written by Mr. McLane immediately after the fatal night of February 20th. The four stanzas of his prologue to "Spindrift" and the two of the epilogue, a sequence in variant sonnet form, dedicated to the memory of Charles MacVeagh, are poetry pure and simple. Prefacing his tribute with the Platonic epigram of the morning and evening star, the young poet produces elegy spontaneous, impassioned, heart-broken but heart-comforting, all the more impressive and persuasive because, instinctively, the tradition hallowed by the practice of the master elegists is preserved. The reader of the volume will recognize in this "In Memoriam" more than promise of poetic achievement. Within the circuit of a setting and rising sun the poet-lover has passed from the ecstasy of alterable joy and reparable grief to passion ineluctable, and has awakened to maturity of imaginative insight and power. From black and bitter debate there issues a starry certitude.

To print selections from a sonnet-sequence is both unjust and cruel; even more so, to print fragments of individual sonnets. But what follows—the first and last of the sonnets of the prologue and portions of the second and third—may suggest some savour of the threnody as a whole:

Oh no more dead than the unsleeping stars,
The music of your lips shall sing for ever,
Beauty exalted, and your love wane never,
Though year by year the lustre of the moon
Wither, and Spring go from us all too soon;
Yet shall Time's fingers twist Love's hindling hairs
Closer about our hearts, for your mute breath
Has stirred to song the silences of Death.
You were the moon of all our devious ways:
Yours was the faith of flowers: yours the pride
Of Beauty's final laughter—now the days,
Hallowed by your pervading light, sweep by Till Death, grown golden since the hour you died, Calls us to you . . . it will be good to die.

It will be good to die since you have died:
It will be good to go the way you trod
Wide-eyed, undreaming, like some lovely god
Flushed with the dawn of an unearthly pride.
It will be good to try the ways you tried,
And venture unafraid into the dark
That lies beyond the furthest planet's spark—
It will be good to die since you have died. . . .

To live is to remember, and to die
Ultimate recollection—we through you
Have touched on things eternal, and the sky
That in your new nativity is blue
With unprevisioned radiance shall keep
The sanctity of your untroubled sleep.

Faltering words that can not tell my love—
Faltering songs that can not sing your praise—
The searching loneliness of twilight days
My heart's dumb, stumbling impotence shall prove.
Always your light is with me, near or far,
Eventual love, a light that stoops to bless
One who but feels his kinship with a star
—A love transcending love—a loneliness.
But you and I and these you love are sure
That all is well with you . . . and yet we feel
A strange futility has set its seal
Upon our hearts, knowing we must endure
Silence—God is so silent in His pride—
It will be good to die since you have died.

The continuation in the epilogue is more intimately personal and poetically descriptive, pathetic but courageous with that "unswerving trust in Truth" and in nobility imperishable that characterized the friend who turned aside

And strode with confidence of youth's clean pride
Into Death's shadows.—Did you toss your head
And laugh imperiously, and make the dead
Suddenly glad to know that you had died?

With the ripeness that comes of years and of studious devotion to art and to the vital significance that alone makes art worth while the young man who wrote this elegy should go far. CHARLES MILLS GAYLEY.

The world's record for ocean crossings is probably held by Captain Arthur R. Mills. He has made 1068 crossings of the Atlantic for the American Line in forty-one years of service, steaming a total distance of 3,000,000 miles, equal to 128 times around the earth. He was decorated by France with the Legion of Honor.

ADVENTURES AND ENTHUSIASMS.

Mr. E. V. Lucas, the most charming of essayists, has made a selection of some of his favorite papers and issued them in a substantial volume. Those unfamiliar with Mr. Lucas, if such there be, may be persuaded to make his acquaintance by the following reprint of the little sketch entitled "A South Sea Buhhle":

"I want you," said my hostess, "to take in Mrs. Blank. She is charming. All through the war she has been with her husband in the South Seas. London is a new place to her."

Mrs. Blank did not look too promising. She was pretty in her way—"elegant" an American would have called her—but she lacked animation. However, the South Seas . . . ! Any one fresh from the Pacific must have enough to tell to see soup, fish, and entrée safely through.

I began by remarking that she must find London a very complete change after the sun and serenity that she had come from.

"It's certainly noisier," she said; "but we had our share of rain."

"I thought it was always fine there," I remarked; but she laughed a denial and relapsed into silence.

She was one of those women who don't take soup, and this made the economy of her utterances the more unfair.

Racking my brain for a new start, I fell hack on those useful fellows, the authors. Presuming that any one who had lived in that fascinating region—the promised land of so many of us who are weary of English climatic treacheries—would be familiar with the literature of it, I went boldly to work.

"The first hook about the South Seas that I ever read," I said, "was Ballantyne's 'Coral Island.'"

"Indeed!" she replied.

I asked her if she, too, had been brought up on Ballantyne, and she said no. She did not even know his name.

"He wrote for boys," I explained, rather lamely.

"I read poetry chiefly as a girl," she said.

"But surely you know Stevenson's 'Island Nights' Entertainments?" I said.

No, she did not. Was it nice?

"It's extraordinary," I said. "It gives you more of the atmosphere of the South Seas than any other work. And Louis Becke—you must have read him?" I continued.

No, she had not. She read very little. The last book she had read was on spiritualism.

"Not even Conrad?" I pursued. "No one has so described the calms and storms of the Pacific."

No, she remembered no story called Conrad.

I was about to explain that Conrad was the writer, not the written; but it seemed a waste of words, and we fell into a stillness broken only by the sound of knife and fork.

"I wonder," I ventured next, "if you came across any one who had met Ganguin?"

"Go—what?" she asked.

"That amazing Peruvian-Frenchman," I went on, with a certain foolish desperation. "Ganguin. He lived in Tahiti."

"How comically geographical you are!" was all she replied, and again a silence brooded over our plates.

"Hang it! you shall talk," I said to myself; and then aloud, "Tell me all about copra. I have longed to know what copra is; how it grows, what it looks like, what it is for."

"You have come to the wrong person," she replied, with very wide eyes. "I never heard of it. Or did you say 'cobra'? Of course I know what a cobra is—it's a snake. I've seen them at the Zoo."

I put her right. "Copra, the stuff that the traders in the South Seas deal in."

"I never heard of it," she said, "but then why should I? I know nothing about the South Seas."

My stock fell thirty points and I crumbled bread nervously, hoping for something sensible to say; but at this moment "half-time" mercifully set in. My partner on the other side turned to me suavely and asked if I thought the verses in "Abraham Lincoln" were a beauty or a blemish; and with the assistance of the Russian ballet, some new novels, and the universal unrest I sailed serenely into port. She was as easy and agreeable a woman as that other was difficult, and before she left for the drawing-room she had invited me to lunch and I had accepted.

As I said good-night to my hostess I asked why she had told me that my first partner had been in the South Seas. She said that she had said nothing of the sort; what she had said was that during the war she had been stationed with her husband, Colonel Blank, at Southsea.—Fram "Adventures and Enthusiasms," Published by the George H. Doran Company.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending November 20, 1920, were $182,100,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $177,500,000; a gain of $4,600,000.

San Francisco's seven national banks made an excellent showing on the call of the controller of the currency for statements of condition as of November 15th, four of the seven reporting decided gains in deposits and the declines in the remaining instances being small.

The Anglo and London Paris National, Wells Fargo National, American National, and Merchants' National were the banks reporting substantial gains.

San Francisco banks usually begin to feel in favor of the waiting buyer. He has not yet been compelled to make seasonal purchases.

It is barely possible that the presidential election has had considerable effect on trade conditions. We have had the same conditions prevailing before in the history of this country. In due time trade will revive and, if the future is to be judged by the past, when the revival comes it will be with a rush. Lower prices will prevail in all lines. In other words, the purchasing power of the dollar will increase.

The wave of economy in buying which we are experiencing in America is also sweeping over all European countries and will have an effect on our exports.

Cancellation of orders heretofore placed, coupled with light demand, has affected many manufacturing lines in widely scattered manufacturing centres. Manufacturers can not afford to run plants, under present high cost of operation, unless their output moves freely. Warehouses full of goods do not pay bills and, under present strained credit conditions, borrowing on warehouse goods is restricted. Hence, there has been a slowing down in many industries. Some plants have been temporarily closed and others have been running on half time or less. This results in unemployment and decreased purchasing power. The shoe and textile trades seem to be especially dull.

That condition can not last long. People must have shoes and knit goods, and if they refrain from buying now they must buy in larger quantities later on. The longer the buying public stints itself in buying, the greater the rush will be when the buying spirit moves them. But even if the rush comes, prices will not be any higher, because the country is today overstocked with merchandise, and manufacturing capacity in the United States largely exceeds consumption in the United States and foreign demand is not taking the surplus.

The decline in the price of hides, wool, and cotton has been heavy and losses in these lines quite severe. Many well-intentioned dealers in these commodities will suffer, which is to be regretted. The high prices which hides and wool reached in the United States invited heavy importation of these articles, just as the high price of sugar, cotton, and rice caused extraordinary importation in these lines. The price of wool and cotton can not be so largely attributed to importations as that of some other articles. It must be that supply of these commodities has caught up and even passed present demand. It is stated that there is enough wool stored in the United States to supply all the demands of this country for a full year.

The decline in the price of the products of the soil has been startling, but results from the fact that there is at last a surplus of these commodities.

It is estimated that 49 per cent. of the population of the country is engaged in agricultural pursuits. The recession in the price of farm products from last year's prices will amount to fully five billion dollars. That means that the purchasing power of 49 per cent. of the population of the country has been decreased by that amount. This recession in purchasing power will necessarily affect business, but we must remember that the farming population of the country has paid off a large proportion of its mortgage indebtedness and accumulated reserves which it can draw upon to tide over a period of depression. This course will probably, to some extent, affect savings deposits in banks, but banks must expect and be prepared for such results. No sane banker has deluded himself with the thought that deposits would continue for all time to pile up as they have been doing for several years past. What we are going through is a gradual return to normal conditions, which is much to be desired. People will meet present conditions by greater economy and greater exertions. It is better to have abundant crops, even if prices recede, than to be short of food supplies.

The country is adopting a lower price basis with relatively little disturbance and slowly but surely the war excesses are being eliminated and our overwrought credit position is being relieved (says the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank in their monthly letter). The fall of prices during October was the greatest ever reported for that month. We are thus getting back towards something like a normal basis of living once more. The process is inevitably preparing the way for better times, and even if there are merchandise failures here and there, the readjustment must be beneficial in the long run. It is absurd to suppose that war prices could continue indefinitely.

That the people are saving more has been shown within the last few weeks by an appreciable increase in savings deposits even at centres where industrial plants are working on a reduced schedule. The investment situation has been materially helped by the broader buying bonds of notes, and seasoned stocks by large and small investors throughout the country. These operations were reflected last month in the heaviest October bond dealings ever reported on the New York Exchange, amounting to $331,723,000. For the first ten months of the year the total trading aggregated $3,073,182,800, as compared with $2,723,170,500 in the same months of 1919. A feature of the present financing has been the sale of large blocks of bonds and notes put out by industrial companies for the purpose of providing permanently for floating indebtedness. A considerable portion of the $330,000,000 of new capital issues represented this shifting of loans from the banks to permanent investors, and as this movement goes on it tends gradually to relieve the credit strain.

A large number of industrial companies of heavy capitalization are being formed to undertake important improvement work and to make possible economies in various branches of manufacture. The combined capitalization of the companies so formed since the beginning of the year aggregates nearly $12,250,000,000, this showing a gain of nearly 20 per cent. for the year. Most of these companies are provided with sufficient working capital to finance them over periods of depression and some are strongly fortified with cash resources. It is significant that the average industrial combination today is much better fortified financially than were the similar companies formed during the period of heavy industrial expansion growing out of the craze for industrial consolidation which followed the organization of the United States Steel Corporation nineteen years ago. The movement to organize new enterprises is still strong and for the twelve months will probably represent a new high record for American industries. The incentive for these combinations seems to be either a reduction in production costs or the building of an organization capable of handling heavy distribution in foreign markets.

The national banks of the country have made a notable record in this year of reconstruction finance. The insignificant number of failures and of losses reported has been remarkable when the intensity of the credit strain is taken into account and the small number of commercial failures indicates how well the banks have taken care of their customers. The Federal Reserve System has functioned admirably and given a good account of itself under the exacting tests of the restrictions attaching to "essential lending" operations. It is not difficult to see what serious distress the country might have been in at this time had it not been for the efforts made to check inflation and to restrict loans to non-productive enterprises. The country has had to make immense advances in connection with the restoration of Europe's crippled industries and the granting of long credits to enable American business men to extend their facilities to foreign customers. This indebtedness has been heavy, but it has represented essential undertakings which could not be financed in any other manner owing to the dislocation of the foreign exchanges and the rise in dollar credits abroad to a level which made it impossible for foreign buyers to settle in the ordinary way for goods and material purchased in the United States. There has never been a year when the banking fraternity has been confronted with a greater number of complex problems, for the whole world has been taken up with the effort to restore the normal order of things in trade and finance.

The $100,000,000 foreign banking corporation under the Edge law projected by the Americans Bankers' Association and the other corporations proposed under that act are very much needed, and should be put through promptly. We hope that this will be done now that the need has become more apparent.

The reserve resources and recuperative powers of the country are far greater than at any previous time when a check of this kind was experienced. The credit situation is stronger. The banking situation is wholly different, which in itself is a factor of great importance. In view of the extent of the price declines the comparatively few cases of embarrassment among business concerns of importance is significant.

There is no gainsaying that the fall season has been seriously demoralized by the unsettled which has developed. The buying power of a great many people in the aggregate has been impaired, measuring their ability by the prices that have been prevailing. The general feeling that these prices can not be sustained has been thoroughly confirmed: the public will have nothing to do with them. When the general level is reduced, so that a common basis for trade is restored, conditions are such that business will be quickly resumed. That can not be accomplished now for the fall season, but if business men will set about getting their houses in order for spring trade on a regular basis the situation should be well stabilized by that time and the field cleared for recovery and a long period of prosperity.—National City Bank, New York.

the influx of crop money from the interior at this season of the year, but this fall the movement is late. Between carrying the farmer's crop and the country merchant's stock of goods, country banks find employment for all their funds. nals there seems to be, throughout the East, South, and Middle West, a decided slowing down in business (says the monthly financial letter of the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles). Great hesitancy on the part of buyers is manifested. This hesitancy results from the fear that there are to be further recessions in the wholesale prices of all classes of merchandise. Dealers are loath to stock up at present prices, thinking they may have to put out the same goods at a loss. Merchants with full lines of goods on their shelves, purchased at higher prices than the same goods can be replaced for, hesitate to cut prices to stimulate trade. Retail buyers are holding off, expecting lower prices. The weather, throughout the fall months, has been their articles of incorporation, increasing the authorized capital stock from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000, at their meeting at Wilmington, Delaware, on Friday, according to word received here.

The amount of preferred stock was increased from $27,500,000 to $40,000,000 and the common from $47,500,000 to $60,000,000. This was an increase of $12,500,000 in both the preferred and common issues, and prepares the way for a distribution to each stockholder of one share of common and one share of preferred for each six shares now owned.

Additional shares of preferred stock are entitled to the same preferences and voting powers and are convertible into common stock and subject to redemption and retirement on the same terms and conditions and are of the same class and character otherwise as the preferred stock originally authorized.

The removal of government control over the wheat market and of restrictions on the importation of sugar have directed public attention more closely to the fact that Canada is returning to normal conditions (says the Canadian Bank of Commerce in its November monthly commercial letter). It is contended by the wheat growers that from the standpoint of the law of supply and demand there is absolutely no reason why the price of wheat should be lower today than a year ago. The only reason why it is lower, as urged by one of their spokesmen, is "the inefficiency in the selling of wheat this year. Great Britain and other nations are working together and acting in an intelligent manner to get their wheat at the lowest possible price, whereas Canada and the United States, as selling nations, are taking no intelligent action whatever to get the best possible price."

The attitude of the government, however, has been made quite clear. In declining to reestablish control over the marketing of wheat this year the minister of trade and commerce directs attention to the change in conditions. Last year a lack of money made it necessary for most European buyers to seek advances from the exporting countries in the forms of loans or credits. This situation and the pooling of their requirements by European governments virtually eliminated free buying. This year, however, the grain exchanges are working, and there is independent buying by a number of countries. Under these normal marketing conditions, and following heavy deliveries during October, prices of all grains weakened appreciably.

Some interesting figures are cited by Martin Judge, Jr., American National Bank Building, San Francisco, showing the high bond prices that prevailed for certain railroad bonds fifteen years ago. The same bonds, and similar issues, have been obtainable during the past few months at about the lowest prices at which they have ever sold, although in every instance the equity behind the issue has been enormously increased by the expenditure of many millions of dollars.

Southern Pacific Branch Railway 6s, due April, 1937, sold at 135½ in 1906, now 102. Central Pacific first refund 4s, due August, 1949, sold at 103½ in 1905, now about 74. West Shore Railroad 4s, due January, 2361, sold at 109½ in 1905, now about 74½. Central Pacific Lucin Cut-Off 4s, due October, 1954, sold at 100 in 1905, now about 73. Pittsburg, McKeesport and Youghiogheny 6s, due July, 1932, sold at 144 in 1905, now about 104. Chicago, Burlington and Quincy (Illinois Division) 3½s, due July, 1949, sold at 102¾ in 1909, now about 73. Minneapolis and St. Louis first 7s, due June, 1927, sold at 142 in 1906, now about 100. Milwaukee, Lake Shore and Western (Ashland Division) 6s, due March, 1925, sold at 134 in 1905, now about 100. Chicago, Indianapolis and Louisville refunding 6s, due 1947, sold at 136 in 1905, now about 101.

There were no 8 per cent. bonds on the market fifteen years ago and very few 7 or 6 per cent. issues. The prevailing rate for gilt-edge bonds was 4 per cent. and these issues often commanded handsome premiums, finding ready markets with insurance companies, estates, and trust funds.

Just at this time careful analysis should be made of all investment lists with a view of taking advantage of present interest rates where it is possible to do so. However, particular care should be exercised, as all the new securities now offering may not stand the test of time.

Under the heading "Is This a Rich Man's Game?" the current number of the Shale Review of Denver applies the query to the production of oil from shale, and in answer says:

"Many articles on oil shale which have been printed in recent years lose much of their effect by reason of statements of enormous amounts which it is claimed must be in hand before any company can undertake shale development. These articles commonly speak of the oil shale industry as 'a rich man's game.' One million dollars is fixed as the minimum amount necessary to be available before the treatment of shales and the production of oil can be undertaken. It happens that most of the writers who make these broad statements fail to deal in specific figures, and it would seem that some answer must be made to these extravagant statements.

"In the first place, there are very few businesses at the present time which are not a 'rich man's game,' and nothing requires so much capital as the production, refining, and marketing of petroleum. The richest corporations in the United States are the oil companies. The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey was considered to be such a menace to business that Congress enacted a law which compelled this corporation to dissolve itself into numerous units. If any business in the world is a rich man's game, it certainly is the oil business. Let us see if the shale industry comes anywhere near approaching the oil business, as we now know it, in capital requirements. An oil well can not be drilled anywhere in the United States to a depth of 3000 feet for less than $25,000, and thousands of wells, many of them barren, have been drilled to this depth which have cost $100,000. In drilling an oil well the operator engages in a very hazardous undertaking. Even in proven fields he does not know whether he will obtain production or not. He stakes fortunes in the hope that his enterprise will be successful. In the production of oil from shale all the risks of discovery are eliminated. When an individual or corporation proposes to embark in the treatment of shale the volume and richness of the crude product is known definitely. The cost of the plant can be determined to a cent before any money is expended. Shale retorts have been built in the United States which can produce from fifty to one hundred barrels of oil daily that have cost less than one-half the average expenditure for deep holes, even in proven wells. One concern in Denver offers to build a shale retort whose operation will be guaranteed for $15,000. This retort will produce fifty barrels of oil daily, and if the shale bodies are accessible and the mining conditions favorable this retort can make oil for $1.50 a barrel and continue to make it for many years. This is not an enormous sum and is very much less than the million dollars which some writers insist must be in hand before shale can be treated profitably. There are very few business enterprises which can be undertaken for such a modest sum of money. The oil shale industry may not be a 'poor man's game,' but it is much nearer a poor man's game than drilling oil wells and many other forms of business enterprise."

George H. Burr & Co. have received the following information regarding the splendid growth and development of the J. C. Penney Company:

"That chain store companies are but little affected by the present depression is plainly evident from the average increase of 28 per cent. in the sales of seven chain store companies in September, 1920, over the same month in 1919. While there is no longer a keen demand for high-priced goods, the low-priced merchandise handled by chain stores is being heavily bought.

"The J. C. Penney Company, which operates the largest chain of department stores of its kind in the world, is having a prosperous year. During the last twelve months this company has increased the number of its stores from 197 to 309.

"As has been the case for many years past, the company reports sales which are showing a steady increase. For the nine months to the end of September they were $27,206,792 in 1920 as compared to $18,494,938 in the same period in 1919—an increase of over 47 per cent.

"The company's earnings are reflecting this increased business. For the first six months of 1920 they are reported as $975,016 after Federal taxes. If this rate is maintained throughout the year, indications point to earnings on the company's preferred stock, listed on the New York Stock Exchange, equivalent to 65.01 per cent."

Bakersfield, with a population of 20,000 and county seat of Kern County, is situated on the main line of the Southern Pacific and Santa Fé railroads. It is the metropolis of a very large territory devoted to farming, fruit-raising, stock-raising, dairying, and oil production. Bakersfield is one of the principal cities in the state and is the chief distributing point for Kern County, one of the largest counties in the West, equaling some of the Eastern states in size.

Is It Kind-Hearted Propaganda?

"In the Mountains" is an anonymous novel. It is also a delightful one. Why the writer should be willing to remain the unknown author of such an original, unbackneyed, and really choice and beautifully conceived and written story is, or would be a puzzler, except for one clue.

The story is located in the Swiss mountains, where, in a summer chalet, the delightful character who writes in the first person has retired to be healed of a heart-searing sorrow. Hither come two English ladies, and the lonely chataleine, who falls in love with the younger of the rather old-fashioned Britishly provincial pair, by hook or crook secures them as guests for her lonely chalet.

It would be telling to let out the culmination of the simple, but original and charmingly but not too palpably humorous recital that follows. The reader surrenders himself with zest to reading the chronicle of this Adamless Eden, knowing all the time that the Adam will eventually turn up. And he does, in a most unexpected guise. The air of the little chalet develops unexpected qualities and an atmosphere of truth develops. Also an original and piquant courtship. But the writer never peeps about her kind-hearted propaganda. It is aimed—if propaganda it is—at those people who were guilty of petty persecution of the British wives or widows of German subjects during and following the war. One divines that little tragedies have taken place, and the author's method of changing the tragedy into a cozy domestic drama is warmly welcomed by the sympathetic reader, who says to himself, "Where have I met this enchanting lady before? Was it by any chance in 'Elizaheth's German Garden'?"

IN THE MOUNTAINS. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co.

South Sea Foam.

A bewildering, enchanting mixture of pagan mythology and modern realism, of anthropology and adventures more thrilling than the original Arabian Nights' Tales; of poetry and comedy and tragedy—that is what "South Sea Foam" is, all rendered with an art so fresh that it seems artless.

One wonders at the lavishness of Mr. Safroni-Middleton in pouring into one volume enough "copy" to have made a compete set of works of a more commercial or less genuine artist. The enchanted reader—for literally he is enchanted by all this southern moon-glow—is whirled through typhoons, cannibal melees; through lurlesque romances reminiscent of Charles Lever and island tragedies that leave him ineffably saddened; from the dimly glorious shadowland of the old Polynesian gods to drunken sailors' brawls in havens for criminal refugees; from prose poems of a very real heauty to blood-curdling adventures of the weirdest sort. And strange to say, never once does a doubt cross the delighted reader's mind, possibly because he is hewitched. But the witchery lasts in a most satisfactory manner, casting its pale, glamorous shadow over one's memory of "South Sea Foam."

A less consummate artist than Mr. Middleton proves himself to be could so easily have spoiled it all. It was a courageous thing to close his memoirs with the sad note of Soogy's death, after having sounded such rollicking notes as the "Abduction of a Princess." But the hook suffers no consequences as a result of its heterogeneous material. Not once is there a dissonance resulting from the swift succession of such various tales, where hithos and anti-climax would have been the fate of a less sure touch.

Somewhere in referring to one of the delectable old pagan poets Mr. Middleton says that the true poet and literary man is always a musician. Of Mr. Middleton, who is hy profession a violinist, one might say conversely that the true musician is also a poet. But one does not know whether to congratulate him most on his musically written hook or on having lived these wonderful adventures.

Labor and the Employer.

"Labor and the Employer," by Samuel Gompers, is a collection of Mr. Gompers' numerous speeches, addresses, and articles bearing on the subject of the labor-union movement and the American Federation of Labor since 1883 to the present time. These documents are arranged, not chronologically, but grouped under chapter headings, so that they form an indirect exposition of the subject. Except for the inferential argument, the hook is rather a history of the labor movement as experienced hy Mr. Gompers than a treatise on labor. The volume forms a detailed chronicle step by step of the growth of the unions taken from such various aspects as "Child Labor and Woman in Industry," "The Labor View of Profit-Sharing," "The Union Shop and the Open Shop," "The Shorter Working Day."

Except for occasional papers or speeches for United States Senate committees, lobby House investigation committees, industrial commissions, the Journal of Commerce, etc., these articles are not an argument for labor unions addressed to the public, but are straight talks to the working man, papers for the American Federationist, or annual reports to the A. F. of L. For the student of economics, for employers, in fact for every one vitally interested in the labor question, these papers should form a reliable source of first-hand information.

Probably the most interesting chapter is "Industrial Warfare," with the subdivisions, "Strikes," "The Boycott," "Picketing," "Violence and Graft," and "Restrictions on Labor Activities." Gompers plainly expresses himself that strikes should be used only as a last resort, but of course justifies them in that capacity. "To know when to strike, and particularly when not to strike, is a science not yet fully understood" is the interesting keynote of one of these papers, addressed to the American Federation of Labor. The reader discovers that the "when not to strike" refers to the strikers' interests—not to the public's. Another clarion note is sounded in a brief paragraph on page 191:

"Show me a country in which there are no strikes and I'll show you that country in which there is no liberty. The state, when it has interfered with industrial affairs, has become the greatest tyrant in the world."

But that speech was spoken twenty years ago, and probably Mr. Gompers did not foresee the tyrant that labor could become in this latter age, with the anarchy of the world war to use as a lever for hoisting wages, and consequently prices, beyond the outside edge of the limit.

On the subject of police striking Mr. Gompers is emphatic. He does not recognize the right of the police to strike, but later makes the apparently inconsistent statement: "The difference between a strike where the public is not inconvenienced and where it is should have no hearing on the justice of the dispute." Mr. Gompers should be more lucid as to exactly what the term "inconvenienced" here means. And then he puts the question, meant as the last word on the justification of striking, "Should the public deny justice to those who may have to strike?" The logical answer is, "It is a one-sided justice when the public suffers."—R. G.

Briefer Reviews.

The latest addition to the How to Develop Series, now in course of publication by Edward J. Clode, is "How to Develop Your Will Power," by Claire Tree Major.

"The Sandman's Mountain," by Louis Dodge (Charles Scribner's Sons; $3), is described as "a story for large persons to read to small persons." Mr. Dodge needs no introduction. His name on a title-page is sufficient recommendation, an additional attraction being the illustrations by Paul Bransom.

Under the title of "Peter" the Houghton Mifflin Company has published a character sketch of a dog hy Arthur S. Hardy. It is admirably done, but what, after all, do we know of the minds of animals?

Those who want a popular but somewhat lightweight and ecstatic hlography of Herbert Hoover will find it in "The Making of Herhert Hoover," hy Rose Wilder Lane, just published hy the Century Company.

"Stories for Good Children," hy Lora B. Peck (Little, Brown & Co.; $1.50), consists of tales "drawn from the best imaginative literature of every land and time." Children eight years old can read them easily, and no child will read them without enjoyment.

Roy J. Snell, who has already written some capital hooks for boys, now gives us "Soolook Wild Boy," the story of an Eskimo hoy, thrust out by his own people in a land of snow and ice to die of starvation during a time of famine. It is published, with illustrations, hy Little, Brown & Co.

"The Nurseries of Heaven," edited by G. Vale Owen and H. A. Dallas (E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.50), is described as "a series of essays hy various writers concerning the future life of children with experience of their manifestation after death." Perhaps that will be a sufficient description for most of our readers.

The Houghton Mifflin Company has published "The Strange Year," hy Eliza Orne White. It is a sequel to "The Blue Aunt," and the children who are the principal characters are the same as in the earlier book, with the addition of an attractive little crippled girl who moves into the neighborhood. Price, $1.65.

The Modern Students' Library, now being published by Charles Scribner's Sons, already contains some twenty volumes hy great authors. These little hooks are compact in form and admirable in workmanship, in every way worthy of the library shelves. The latest addition is "Emerson's Essays," selected and edited with an introduction by Professor Arthur Hobson Quinn.

"French: A Practical Handbook for Self-Instruction," hy Edouard Dunois, M. A., has been published hy Edward J. Clode. A publisher's note says: "The method of self-instruction as offered in this volume is of a very notable simplicity. Yet the teaching is comprehensive to such an extent that the student may easily derive from it a satisfactory knowledge of the language."

The Houghton Mifflin Company has published "The Dreadful River Cave," hy James Willard Schultz. Like Mr. Schultz's other books, this story deals with real live Indians, not hook Indians, and has plenty of action and interesting Indian lore. It tells the story of a young brave, Black Elk, and his exciting adventures, centering about a mysterious cave behind a waterfall.

Edwin L. Sahin takes an easy first place among the writers of histories for boys and young people in general. His latest volume is "Into Mexico with General Scott," in which

The Gate of Ivory.

This is the story of Allan Conway, who was so fine a man that he was hardly respectable. Conway is secretary to Richard Gwynn of Maryland, a successful lawyer who is already treasurer of the state and who hopes to be its governor. Now Conway ought to have known that he had no right to fall in love with his employer's beautiful and worthless wife, Eleanor, but none the less he does so, and she with him. But Conway's curious conscience prevents the affair from following the usual course. Unless Eleanor will go away with him and leave her husband he refuses to take advantage of her surrender. But Eleanor will not do this because it means the loss of comfort and social position, and so there is a deadlock and a series of rather tiresome discussions on the ethics of a dubious situation. In the meantime Gwynn has been spending money like water in the pursuit of the governorship. Eleanor runs into debt for her hospitalities and with her husband's connivance steals some bonds from the state treasury, which she can easily do as she is allowed to deposit her jewelry in the vault and to carry a key. When detection becomes certain Gwynn compels his wife to assent to a plan by which the blame shall be placed on Conway, whose silence is guaranteed by his love for Eleanor. So Conway is disbarred and driven into obscurity while Gwynn goes triumphantly forward to the governorship and Eleanor climbs to the top of the social ladder.

Vice is triumphant and virtue is in the dust. If it be said that Conway is immoral and therefore the sublimity of his abnegation is a contradiction, it may be said that nothing is more remarkable than the goodness of had men.

In some of its parts the story tends to proximity and unreality, but the central idea is a sound one and it is developed with skill and vigor.

No Defense.

Gilbert Parker is at his best when writing of Canada. This is by no means an implication that "No Defense" is not a good novel. It is a very good novel, but we seem to miss that intimate familiarity with person and scene that has distinguished so many of his earlier stories. "No Defense" is a story of Irish rebellion in the early days. Dyck Calhoun refuses to be enmeshed in the net of Irish revolt, and as already he knows too much of the contemplated French invasion he is accused of a murder and railroaded to jail. On his release, and in desperation for the means of livelihood, he enlists in the navy, participates in mutiny, and sails to Virginia in command of a captured warship. There he would assuredly have been taken and hanged but for his opportune aid against a rising of the slaves and the Maroons. This secures him a pardon at the hands of the governor, Lord Mallow. Of course there is a beautiful Irish girl whom Dyck knew in Ireland and who has preceded him to the colony, and so everything ends up in the way that we still like to consider as satisfactory.

No Defense. By Gilbert Parker. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company.

Problems of Today.

This volume by Mr. Moorfield Storey consists of the Godkin Lectures delivered in March, 1920. It is an enumeration and a brief survey of some modern national problems, all of them instantly soluble in a little common sense. For example, the author asks why we allow a little handful of Irishmen to invoke a war between America and Great Britain which would destroy what little is left of civilization, why we allow certain people in the South to amuse themselves by burning negroes, why we allow organizations outside of the law to ruin industries or to deprive large masses of innocent people of the necessities of life. The answer is, of course, to be found in the vicious stupidity of electorates. Education, says the author, is the remedy. But we seem to have tried that. Learning appears to have failed as a prophylactic against chaos.

PROBLEMS OF TODAY. By Moorfield Storey. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.50.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

Camille Flammarion, probably the most widely known astronomer in the world, has recently been quoted as saying that Americans are depriving themselves of the possibility of communicating with the spirits of their dead by the practice of cremation. His book, "The Unknown," a new edition of which was recently published by the Harpers, is the result of his earlier investigations in the field of psychic phenomena.

"Flame and Shadow," by Sara Teasdale Filsinger, will be published before the end of the month. This is the first volume of her poems to be published since "Love Songs," which won the Columbia University Poetry Prize in 1917.

James Huneker is finding himself perilously near the best-seller category. "Steeplejack" (Scribners), the brilliant critic's autobiography, is reported as one of the books most in demand on the Pacific Coast. The first edition was sold on publication, the second disappeared in less time than it takes to tell it, and the third edition of the irrepressible "Steeplejack" is going fast.

Charles Scribner's Sons announce that they have just obtained the publishing rights for "A Kiss of Cinderella," Sir James Barrie's play in which Maude Adams starred with success. This will be the first appearance of the play in book form.

THE ENEMIES OF WOMEN

Is there anything stronger than the appeal a woman has for a man?

Blasco Ibanez finds the self-sufficiency of the male routed all along the line. In his Alicia he has concentrated all the resistless fascination of the female of the species as she was found in the old Europe of the pre-war days. But how the lure of sex may in great crises become a regenerator of character is shown in this new volume which does for the war's ideals what "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" did for the war as a conflict of material forces.

COLLOQUIAL JAPANESE. By William Montgomery

"UP IN MABEL'S ROOM."

This Collison-Harbach farce belongs to that order of plays that once seen are never remembered. After I had listened to the opening scene for a few moments it suddenly came over me that I had heard it before. Up to that time neither the title nor the underwear motive had stirred up any recollections. They even have the same people; or some of them, anyway; which seems to argue that it wasn't so very long ago that the piece was given here.

"Up in Mabel's Room" belongs to the category of bedroom, slightly off-color farces that are written for gay, youthful, light-minded materialists: people whose idea of heaven is musical comedy and a cabaret, accompanied by a grand feed. They eat well, dress well, play cards well, live well. Their women make the streets gay with their good looks and style. These people help along numerous businesses, for they are great spenders. They keep hotels, cafés, apartment houses, and theatres going by their patronage. They are—anyway their women are while they are young—good to look at and they are often extremely likable in a superficial way.

But oh heaven, think of spending a summer season in the country with them. They have no mental resources but cards, gossip, and stories that are off color, like the situations in their favorite farces. Without being in the least vicious, they like this type of stories. They mean no harm; it is just because of their empty-headed, cheerful, self-satisfied materialism. Generally people of this kind are practical, often shrewd. They have plenty of domestic virtues, being affectionate in family relations and often, perhaps generally, pay their bills. In fact the world couldn't get along without them, probably. But to entertain one's self at the theatre entirely by their standards would be like eating quail for dinner every day.

"Up in Mabel's Room" is a typical piece of this order. It requires, for suitable presentation, about four couples and a servant or two, a bedroom or two, and a bathroom or two. The women must all be able to carry exceedingly smart clothes with the tip-top of smartness, which we can truly say that Julie Ring and Grace Fielding do—also, in a less degree, perhaps, Gertrude Webster.

The men in a farce of this order must consist of one prime comedian—in this case Sager Midgeley—and a group of others ready to be energetically social, make private frenzied signals to each other, and practice gymnastic farce during the leading scene. Thus Sager Midgeley, who is in appearance a sober, settled, and comfortably rounded out citizen, is obliged to put in a lot of physical exercise rolling under Mabel's bed in moments of guilty terror, while his man servant shoots down into a laundry box at the inconveniently frequent intervals when the alarm sounds. They always have a laundry basket or so in these bedroom farces, and there are so many references to underwear and so much underwear being popped into the laundry baskets that one can not but feel a fastidious sensation about one's olfactories.

What makes these farces fail to offend is because of the heedfulness with which the authors make the characters of unexceptionable respectability. Never a word or a phrase is uttered that you could cavil at. It is merely the idea, and when any article or situation is alluded to that seems to smack of impropriety the voice is respectfully lowered, while the audience laughs hilariously.

Julie Ring—who does her physical share in farce activities by walking miles in Mabel's bedroom—has good looks, style, personality, and a neat, incisive utterance. She looks like a clever woman.

Grace Fielding has a pretty face, a roguish smile, and, like Julie Ring, a dazzling wardrobe. In these farces the numerous changes amount to a fashion display. The women in bedroom-farceland change three times after 6 p. m.; once for dinner, once for a thrilling negligée suitable for the evening gossip, and once into gauzy pajamas for bed.

Besides the women mentioned there is Josephine Saxe, whose carefully cultivated bahysms are too exaggerated. This actress hasn't developed a pin's point since we first saw her in "Twin Beds" and when the baby eyes and baby lips have faded it looks as if Josephine won't have much left. At present she has a wide-eyed gaze, a rosebud mouth, and a seductively curving figure.

Gertrude Webster has a stylish figure and stage presence. Eugenia Geinova did her French maid hit well, and Messrs. Dorbin and Bradley did their servant parts neatly. Besides these, Messrs. Norval and Lewis played the parts respectively of an enamored suitor and an equally enamored spouse with suitable farcical spirit.

The setting of the first act was extremely handsome, as an indication of the financial ease of the characters, who were suggestive of that large, light-minded, moneyed class in America who take their pleasures gayly and expensively.

"HEDDA GABLER."

For this week Mr. Maitland, recognizing the desire of the present generation to acquire familiarity with the works of Ibsen, has put on "Hedda Gabler." To know Hedda is not to love her, and she is rather apt, like others of Ibsen's masterpieces, notably "Ghosts," to disagree with people's mental digestion.

For Hedda is, in a way, like Oswald, a pathological case. She has the soul of a dissolute youth in a beautiful body, whose chastity she has sedulously preserved, while her curious, inquiring mind is given over to corruption.

It has been said of Hedda that Ibsen never saw her prototype, but huddled her out of the traits of several women. Certain it is that she is not strictly normal, but probably, in creating her, Ibsen wished to give another slap to his detested compatriots the Norwegians, whose petty provincialism did not allow for the natural exuberance of youthful joys. "Look," we can imagine him saying, as he launched his Hedda on a puzzled and rather affronted world, "look at what results in your social life, so devoid of natural vent for temperaments that vary from what is prescribed by your narrow rules."

Hedda, however, must be partly accounted for by being the daughter of an old voluptuary, whose dissolute soul had passed into her maiden's body. She is not a particularly stimulating person to pass the evening with unless she is interpreted by some actress who can express the haleful fascination wherein lay Hedda's baffling and morbid charm.

Therefore we are only seeing Hedda as through a glass darkly. However, the play, like the majority of Ibsen's, is eminently actable, because that greatest master of dramatic construction cast all his prose dramas, even those most given over to mystic symbolism—as, for instance, "The Lady from the Sea"—into a form of simple, everyday realism. Therefore the family life of the Tesmans, the revelation of Aunt Julia's simple-hearted selflessness, the self-interested scheming of the Tesmans' neighbor, Counselor Brack, the prosy commonplaces of Hedda's despised mate, and the intellectual comradeship between Thea and Lovborg, which Hedda ruthlessly seeks to destroy, all these belong to the literature of the world, and those who wish to have a literary acquaintance with masterpieces should know "Hedda Gabler."

The company, strengthened by the return of J. Anthony Smythe, gave, generally speaking, a creditable representation, the work of Mr. Maitland and Mr. Smythe, however, standing out above that of the others.

"FIVE O'CLOCK."

Not a particularly meaningful title that; but then "Five O'Clock" is not a particularly meaningful play. It is melodramatic comedy, written by Frank Bacon, one-time stock comedian at the Alcazar—and among the best they ever had—and at present New York playwright and star.

Frank Bacon "arrived" some years ago: how thoroughly we first learned in "The Fortune Hunter," in which he so beautifully played the rôle of the old inventor. Since then Mr. Bacon has taken to play-writing: doubtless recognizing that the facile public can be amused pretty easily, and that he might as well supply his own vehicles as pay some one else handsome sums to do so. He is the author of "Lightnin'," which is now in the third year of its run at the New York Gaiety. I am told that it is rather a lightweight play, but its long run shows that the author, profiting by his long experience as an actor, has learned what the public wants.

The Alcazar public took very kindly to "Five O'Clock," punctuating the performance with laughter in a way quite soothing to the managerial heart.

"Five O'Clock," however, is not exactly a play one can enthuse over, as it has a number of faults, chief among which is that it is too long, is rather overweighted with plot, and the author handles a rather delicate situation—one in which a daughter has to accuse her father of stealing the authorship of a book from the man she loves—in a manner that does not sufficiently indicate the daughter's sufferings. Nor is the comedy particularly well conceived. There is too much dependence on catchwords, too much repetition.

The chief motive, however, is an interesting one; but stay, which is the chief motive? The incarceration of a perfectly sane man in a private insane asylum or the theft and publication by one man of the manuscript of a book written by another?

Which brings to light still another fault of the author; that is, an excess of material due to the parallel running of these two main motives.

However, it is a good fault not to have a play too thin and sleazy. And besides, the play shows study on the author's part. He has been looking up the methods used in "the well-made play," as indicated by the amount of intrigue.

The plot leads up to a scene in which the uncovering of a conspiracy for purposes of gain of a sane man's relatives to keep him in a reputed sanitarium—really for "mental cases"—ought to be the principal one in the play. But the comedy element intrudes too much, and the main scene becomes that in which the thieving, reputed author is faced

It is said that previous to 1860, Lohos Creek water was delivered to consumers from "a small reservoir on the east side of Telegraph Hill, 60 feet above the Bay." No documentary record or picture of such a reservoir seems to remain.

Francisco Street Reservoir, on the north slope of Russian Hill between Chestnut and Francisco Streets, has the longest service record of any reservoir in the city.

It was completed January 7, 1860, at a time when Lohos Creek was the city's principal water source.

For many years now, Francisco has been an auxiliary reservoir used in the solution of certain altitude and pressure problems peculiar to that section of the city.

It is filled by gravity from the big University Mound Reservoir on the south side of San Francisco, its capacity being four million gallons.

From its elevation of 135 feet Francisco water flows by gravity to Black Point Pumps, which lift it to the elevation necessary to supply Pacific Heights.

"Connected with the lower (Francisco Street) reservoir there are already laid in the city 74,000 feet of pipe, extending from North Beach to and beyond South Park. Attached to these pipes there are 100 fire hydrants."—Henry G. Langley, 1860.

and accused, and finally, breaking down, makes open confession.

"Five O'Clock" struck me as a play with considerable possibilities. It has almost enough material for two plays, but it needs shortening and revision to intensify its drama and lighten its comedy.

It has plentiful entertaining possibilities for the general public, and the author is well up in that joyous slang argot to which an audience always takes so kindly.

It took about a dozen players to present the play, Elwyn Harvey figuring as the daughter who, in order to save her sweet-heart, is faced with the painful alternative of accusing her father.

Neither by the playwright nor the actress were these scenes well presented. Miss Harvey's girlish gaiety in her preliminary scenes seemed forced and mechanical, and in the later ones there was not sufficient indication of suffering.

Mr. Dudley Ayres' refined and amiable personality fitted into the rôle of the young prisoner, Charles Yule worked out a very acceptable conception of the independent old country doctor, and Ben Erway dealt gallantly with the lengthy diatribes of the fool conspirator who spilled the fat in the fire.

Rafael Brunetto nearly drove us to drink by his rapid, indistinct utterance. But in the scene of accusation and confession he came through pretty well, expressing the shamed collapse of an outwardly imposing weakling.

Two new players, one Walter Emerson, the other Edna Peckham, whom we have already seen in a couple of rôles, showed promise in their handling of the over-lengthy comedy stuff of the hellhop and the waitress. And Emily Pinter, Gladys Emmons, and Al Cunningham rounded out the performance by their, as usual, conscientious work.

FOUR ARTS IN ONE.

A union of the arts to produce a harmonious totality was employed with extremely pleasing effect at the Philomath Club this week, the chief motive being the interpretative dancing of Agnes Kalman Rush and Dorothy Manners Dreifus.

"Rhythm" was the theme, the dancers illustrating primitive rhythms by rhythmic movements in time to the beating of a native tomtom until the instinctively rhythmic movements gradually developed into a dance of joyous abandon.

The elfin joy of Pan, the more measured and restrained exhilaration of Terpsichore, the tragic woe of Melpomene, and the cadenced measures plucked from the harp-strings of Polhymnia, the whole leading up to a joyous Bacchanale, an expression of the sun-purpled fruition of autumn's harvest, constituted a programme of unusual beauty. The art of the two dancers is in line with that of Isadora Duncan and Ruth St. Denis, the pleasing addition of literature and verbal music being made to the group of arts. For Miss Edna C. Cohen wrote for each dance an introduction characterized by classic felicity of phrase, while Mrs. A. L. Gump, who read these graceful bits of literature, lent verbal music to the general pleasing harmony.

The music, under the direction of Rodion Mendelevitsh, was played by members of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, the compositions chosen being in felicitous accord with the sentiment expressed in each dance. JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Curran Theatre.

"Chu Chin Chow," coming to the Curran Theatre commencing Monday, November 29th, is in the fifth year of its run at His Majesty's Theatre, London. It was produced there in 1916 and has been presented continuously, in spite of air raids, Zeppelins, and all other obstacles. Two years ago F. Ray Comstock and Morris Gest presented "Chu Chin Chow" in New York, with scenery and costumes made by the original producers in London, but on a much larger scale. "Chu Chin Chow" proved a gorgeous revelation for American audiences, and now the complete production and cast from the Century Theatre is being presented on tour in fourteen scenes and with a company of 300 people.

"Chu Chin Chow" is a romance of ancient Bagdad and tells the story of Abu Hasan, the robber chief, who disguises himself as Chu Chin Chow, a rich Chinese merchant, and enters Bagdad to rob Kasim Baha, a wealthy miser, and to raid the slave market. His plans are foiled by Zahrat, the desert woman, a slave who brings about his downfall, but not until fourteen brilliant and wonderful scenes with music, dance, and pageant have been unfolded. The music, by Frederick Norton, is especially alluring and tuneful and there are eighteen musical hits in the score. There are 865 dazzling and brilliant costumes of many colors and a mannequin parade of fashion models of ancient Bagdad that exhibits some of the most striking costumes ever designed.

The Alcazar Theatre.

"Crooked Gamblers" has been released to the Alcazar for only representation outside of New York. It is such an up-to-the-minute novelty that it will run for two weeks, commencing next Sunday matinee. This departure from the fixed Alcazar policy of a weekly change is justified by the splendid New York success of a novel play riving with merriment and exciting in its exposé of methods by which crooked stock promoters juggle the market and wring millions from credulous victims "caught coming and going." There is a splendid love story with two tire manufacturers striving for the hand of the same girl and disagreeing about their business policy. But they are splendid in personal loyalty, and although the best man wins in the courtship, both gallantly defeat the plotters who try to ruin their business. Dudley Ayres and Elwyn Harvey head a long cast of graphic character types.

"Watch My Smoke," a new comedy of romance and business by Walter A. Rivers, well-known local newspaper man, has first presentation on Sunday, December 12th. Its hero loses his fear of losing his job, and after telling his "boss" some things that he ought to know, cuts loose for himself and has an exciting experience.

The Orpheum.

The two notables of the present week's bill, Kitty Gordon and Jack Wilson, are chosen to remain a second week at the Orpheum. Due to the unqualified approval meted out by the audiences throughout all Orpheum Circuit cities, Miss Gordon will occupy the headline position during the second week.

Dorothy and Madeline Cameron will delight San Francisco audiences next week. They are described as attractive young women, pretty, smart, chic, and faultlessly gowned. They are assisted in their offering by Edwin Weber at the piano.

William Gaxton will be seen at the head of a capable company in "The Junior Partner," written by Rupert Hughes, author of "Excuse Me" and many successful plays and short stories. In "The Junior Partner" the result of romance and business is shown, and it is demonstrated that the two mix exceedingly well. Gaxton is a light comedian of tried and true quality.

"Pep" is the motive power which Bob Murphy and Elmore White will use in their skit, "A Peppy Arrangement of Tunes and Laughs."

"Telling the Truth" is a pastime in which James McCormack and Eleanor Irving will give their instinct for veracity full play. That is the title of their new act, in which they will be seen on the coming bill.

VANITY FAIR.

It is said that when Mrs. Asquith announced to her husband over the matutinal coffee cups that she had been offered a certain large sum of money for her memoirs Mr. Asquith replied: "My dear, I hope they are not worth nearly so much as that." Mr. Asquith evidently knew wherein consisted the value of a lady's recollections and that their market price would be exactly commensurate with their scandalous nature. The respectabilities and the decorums have no value nowadays. We are not interested in our neighbors unless they are doing something that they ought not to. At least they must be the objects of some reasonable suspicion.

From this point of view Mrs. Asquith's memoirs may be said to be well worth the sum paid for them. English society is seething with indignation and also with foreboding, for it seems that there is more to come, and no one knows where the next blow will fall or the extent to which its force may be increased or mitigated. Mrs. Asquith is said to be enjoying the situation to the full.

But in the meantime her accuracy is being challenged. For example, she tells us a story about Robert Louis Stevenson. She says he paid long visits to John Addington Symonds, and then she quotes Mrs. Symonds as saying that the Stevensons "were not particular, and that what with hemorrhages, ink, and cold mutton gravy, her beautiful sheets were much spoiled." This brings Sir Sidney Colvin into the field with the assurance that the Stevensons "were never guests in the Symonds' house at all," and then comes the publication of a letter written by Mrs. Symonds in 1911 to the effect that she should have "made notes" of the Stevensons' "housekeeping" at Davos, which was "amusing and original." Evidently Mrs. Asquith has been caught in flagrante delicto and the value of her supposed reminiscences is severely impugned.

But what a nasty business it all is. There seems to be hardly a line in these memoirs that usefully adds to our knowledge about any person or place. Life would become unbearable, social intercourse impossible, if the terror of the diarist were always before our eyes. We talk easily and readily because we know that our words have only a temporary vitality, that they will probably be effaced from the minds of their hearers in a few hours. What shackles we should lay on our conversation if we knew that we might be talking to some pestilent diarist who would duly record or misrecord every casual word. Suppose Mrs. Symonds had actually said the rather repulsive thing about the Stevensons attributed to her. We are all liable to such utterances in private talk, utterances that are washed from the memory before the evening is over, but that would look indescribably bad in print, separated from circumstance, environment, tone of voice, gesture, and a dozen other modifying factors. There is no reputation on earth that could be sustained under the weight of a publication of private and domestic conversation. The known presence of an irresponsible diarist would put a blight of silence upon any social gathering in the world. Without the assumption of reticence and confidence we should remain dumb as oysters in one another's presence.

No one should keep a diary. Either it will be a complete record, in which case it will be explosive, or it will be an incomplete record, in which case it will be valueless. Least of all should there be an attempt to record the conversations of others. It is as much a violation of confidence as the reading of another's letters. Even the police warn us that whatever we say may be used in evidence against us, but the diarist issues no such warning. The wretch hegules us into indiscretions by the guaranty of the dinner-table or the drawing-room and then nullifies the guaranty by the atrocity of the diary.

It was a rule at the court of Queen Victoria that no inmate of the house, and particularly no lady in waiting, should keep a diary or make any effort to record what might be seen or heard. Probably the rule was not always kept. To exclude all reference to royal life and royal visitors from private correspondence would be a task greater than flesh and blood could perform. But nothing was ever published that could be described as a breach of confidence. Several diaries relating to the German court have been published, and notably the diary of the ex-emperor's American dentist, which was a gross and vulgar breach of confidence. There have been some two or three really great diaries, such as Pepy's and Evelyn's, but the average diarist is none the less a nuisance and worthy of excommunication with hell, hook, and candle.

A reinforcement for the world demand for lumber is preparing in British East Africa, where there are between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 acres of woodland to draw upon, and a new industry, very infantile at present, is expected to grow so rapidly that the government is now considering plans to improve the harbor facilities for exporting the forests. The best wood is suitable for wheelmakers and wagon-builders and the making of wood block paving, railroad ties, bridges, ox yokes and ax, pick and tool handles. It also makes good flooring and lining boards. The builder, however, must needs be of a patient disposition if he postpones building until these British East African woods are available. Meantime there are new sounds in some of the African forests, the rhythm of the woodman's ax, the huzz of the sawmill, and the puffing of oversized locomotives on the narrow-gauge tracks that are penetrating from the main line of railways into the woodlands. And many a workman, no doubt, will some day work with tools whose handles grew in an African forest.

For a long time it has been known that various forms of dust when mingled with air in certain proportions are capable of producing explosions when brought into contact with them. This danger sometimes exists in flour mills, an instance being the explosions, some years ago, of three flour mills at Minneapolis. It was then demonstrated by experiment that two ounces of flour in two cubic feet of confined air, when ignited, would cause a violent explosion, and it was calculated that the contents of a flour sack distributed through 4000 cubic feet of air would cause an explosion capable of throwing a weight of 2500 tons to a height of 100 cubic feet. A case is of record where sugar dust in a confectionery factory caused an explosion and in another case dry soap proved equally dangerous.

For a judge to indulge in smoking while on the bench is quite common in the courts of India.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The young man was giving a graphic account of a narrow escape he had had from an enraged hulk. "I seized him by the tail," he exclaimed, "an' there I was! I was afraid to hold on and I dare not let go." "Between the horns of a dilemma, as it were," ventured Miss Duhious. "No," replied the young man. "I wasn't between the horns at all; and besides, he wasn't a dilemma; he was a Jersey."

A young man who had been in the city only three days, but who had been paying attention to a pretty girl, wanted to propose, but was afraid he might be thought too hasty. He delicately approached the subject as follows: "If I were to speak to you of marriage, after having only made your acquaintance three days ago, what would you say to it?" "Well, I should say never put off till tomorrow that which you should have done the day before yesterday."

When John McCormack was singing in grand opera, as Signor Foli, some years ago, he had on one occasion to sing from a stage balcony which was hardly strong enough to support so heavy a man. The stage manager told off two assistants to hold it up from beneath, but before Signor Foli was more than half through one of the men below said, "Be jahers, Moike, the Oitalian is mighty heavy." "Let's dhrop him, Pat; he's only an Oitalian, after all." Voice of Signor Foli above: "Will ye, ye devils, will ye?" "Tare an' 'ounds, Pat, but he's an Oirishman! Hould him up for the loife of yez!"

Two Chinese sought to settle a difference about a missing dog before an American judge in a Far Western township. Neither could speak a word of English (or American), so the impatient judge asked the interpreter to find out what kind of a dog it was. The question was put, and the Chinaman replied something like this: "Yung kin a ho chkung yoo fuwl ee hi ksky la; seelwik'ho yng pung hi eekskcooflee yngung hoo; tsi ti foo hwlfski hi png heela kski la hoonyung hi kski ja—" At this juncture the judge interrupted brusquely and demanded of the interpreter again what kind of a dog the trouble was all about. The interpreter replied: "A hlack dog, your honor." "Thank you," said the judge, awarding damages to whichever of the disputants understood him first; adding: "And see here, young feller, it's a good thing for you it wasn't a hlack-and-tan."

In a collision between an auto and a load of hay, the driver of the latter was projected into the village road on his head and lay there semiconscious until two occupants of the more speedy vehicle lifted him out of the dust and started to carry him toward the sidewalk. "Shall we take him into that undertaker's shop there, or to the drug store farther down the street?" asked one of the hurden-hearsers. The victim raised his head with alacrity and vociferated. "Take me to the drug store first, you darn fool!"

A Pittsburgh lawyer was conducting a case in court not long ago and one of the witnesses, a hurly negro, confessed that at the time of his arrest he was engaged in a crap game. Immediately the lawyer said, "Now, sir, I want you to tell the jury just how you deal craps." "Wass dat?" asked the witness, rolling his eyes. "Address the jury, sir," thundered the lawyer, "and tell them just how you deal craps." "Lemme outen heah!" cried the witness uneasily. "Fust thing I know this gem-man gwine to ask me how to drink a sandwich."

Elsie, about to be married, decided at the last moment to test her sweetheart; so, going to her friend Maude, the prettiest girl she knew, she said to her, although she knew it was a great risk: "I'll arrange for Fred to take you out tonight—a walk on the heach in the moonlight, supper, and all that sort of thing—and I want you, in order to put his fidelity to the proof, to ask him for a kiss." Maude laughed, blushed, and assented. The plot was carried out. The next day Elsie visited her friend and said, anxiously: "Well, Maude, did you ask him?" "No, Elsie dear." "No! Why not?" "I didn't get a chance; he asked me first."

It was an outhound car and it was crowded to the doors. The woman had a child in her arms and it was whining and bawling, as is the regulation habit of small children in crowded cars. The mother was doing her best to quiet the child, but was not having any success. The audible comments of the other passengers anent babies in general and this one in particular didn't help soothe the mother's growing irritation any. Finally the car reached George's Cross, and the conductor loudly cried out the name of the place: "George's Cross! George's Cross!" "Of course George is cross," cried the mother with flashing eyes, "and so would you be if you were cutting your hack teeth!"

Two old school chums chanced to meet again, and spent an interesting hour exchanging reminiscences. "But, I say, old chap," began one suddenly, "you say you are in the grocery line. I thought you wanted to go on the stage." "So I did," confessed the other, sheepishly; "but—er I—discovered I wasn't suited for it." "A little bird told you, I suppose?" The other man hesitated, and his face slowly flushed. "Well, no, not exactly," he said; "but they might have been birds if they had been allowed to hatch."

A woe-hegone specimen of the tramp tripe made a call at a rural residence to ask for aid. The door was opened by a woman of angular proportions, severe in demeanor, and uncertain age and temper. Having speedily ascertained the object of the unexpected visit, in raspy tones she observed: "I shall not give you anything. If you had been wise you would not have come here. Do you know who I am?" The weary wanderer replied that he had not the pleasure of knowing. "Well, I'm a policeman's wife, and if he were here he would take you, and very quickly, too." The tired tramp looked at her quickly for a minute, and then replied: "I believe you, ma'am. If he took you he'd take anybody."

Lawson Purdy, secretary of the Charity Organization, said in a brilliant address on charity in New York: "Charity bestowed on the professional heggar is worse than wasted. A gaunt scarecrow with a red nose knocked at the back door of a farmhouse one bitter December day. 'Charity, lady,' he croaked. 'Charity for the sake of the Christmas feast wot's approachin'.' Here he coughed dismally. 'Lady,' he went on, 'I got a splittin' headache and a hackin' cough, and—' But the wise farmer woman interrupted him. 'A splittin' headache and a hackin' cough?' she said. 'Then you won't mind goin' out to the woodshed and splittin' the kindlin' and hackin' them oak logs. When you're through I'll give you a good square meal of—' But the sufferer with a gesture of rage and disgust was already hurrying on his way."

A Pastoral.

Just as the sun was setting
Back of the Western hills
Grandfather stood by the window
Eating the last of his pills.
And Grandmother, by the cupboard,
Knitting, heard him say:
"I ought to have went to the village
To fetch some more pills today."
Then Grandmother snuffed a teardrop
And said, "It is just like I suz
T' th' parson—Grandfather's liver
Aint what it used to was:
"It's gittin' torpid and dormant,
It don't function like of old,
And even them pills he swallows
Don't seem no more t' catch hold;
"They used to grab it and shake it
And joggle it up and down
And turn dear Grandfather yaller
Except when they turned him brown;
"I remember when we was married
His liver was lively and gay,
A kickin' an' rippin' an' givin'
Dear Ezry new pains ev'ry day;
"It used to turn clear over backwards
An' palpitate wuss'n a pump
An' give him the janders and yallers
An' bounce around thumpy-thump;
"But now it is torpid and dormant
And painless and quiet and cold;
Ah, me! all's so peaceful an' quiet
Since Grandfather's liver's grown old!"
Then Grandmother wiped a new teardrop
And sighed: "It is just like I suz
T' th' parson: Grandfather's liver
Aint what it used to was."

On Monday, I read that clothes would be cheap;
That prices were certain to fall.
On Tuesday, I read—the words made me weep—
There'd be no reduction at all.
On Wednesday, I read that clothing would slump.
But cloth would go higher by far.
On Thursday, I read that neither would jump,
But both would remain where they are.
On Friday, I read I should buy right away,
An act I should never repent;
But Saturday counseled a fortnight's delay,
And a saving of thirty per cent.
And so, to make the week complete,
I read the Sunday "funny sheet."

As a great shock to their many friends, the news has been received of an automobile accident ending fatally to Miss Alice Elliott and her brother, Mr. John Elliott, Jr., the daughter and son of Mr. John M. Elliott of Los Angeles. The accident occurred on the night of November 17th in Hollywood.

The Channing Readers.

The enthusiastic audience which greeted the first of the readings in the course of modern drama which is being presented by the Channing Readers this season insures the decided success of each of these events. The play to be given on Friday afternoon, November 26th, is "Beyond the Horizon," by Eugene O. O'Neill, a son of the great actor, James O'Neill, which has been one of the great successes of the year in New York, where Richard Bennett has been playing it for many months. The Channing readers are probably the first to introduce this new play on the Pacific Coast. These "group readings" for the benefit of Channing Auxiliary are held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Austin Wood, 53 Presidio Avenue, corner Jackson Street, and the hour is 3:15. Tickets may be obtained at the door. Mrs. Edwin William Stadtmuller directs the production, and reading with her are Mrs. William A. Hammond, Mrs. James C. Crawford, Mrs. Joy Lichtenstein, Mrs. Eva Merzhach, and Mrs. Chauncey McGovern.

The Columbia Theatre.

"Listen Lester" will be the attraction at the Columbia Theatre for two weeks, commencing with Monday night, November 29th. It ran for nearly a year in New York without interruption, one of the longest runs on record, and when it is considered that eight weeks of that time were during the hottest weather New York had known in many years, the record is all the more astonishing. Besides Fred Heider, the cast includes June Roberts, Delano Dell, Betty Kirkbride, Earl Higley, Claire Grenville, Francis Donegan, René Brown, Evelyn Paul, Nellie Muir, and the Four Entertainers, as well as what is said to be the daintiest, danciest chorus seen for a long time.

Bridge-Tea.

The third bridge-tea on the winter programme of Hotel Whitcomb will be held on Tuesday afternoon, December 7th. Those who have been attending these special tea events in the Sun Lounge will need no introduction to this next tea. Auction bridge will again be the game of the occasion, and as usual there will be a delightful surprise to further increase the pleasure of the guests.

The Maitland Playhouse.

Since Maitland Playhouse patrons have proved their partiality this season to plays by George Bernard Shaw, they will welcome the news that still another Shaw play is to be produced at the Stockton Street house this coming week.

"Fanny's First Play" is the name of the satire selected by Arthur Maitland. In "Fanny's First Play" we have that rare phenomenon, an author satirizing himself as well as other playwrights. It is the story of a young girl whose father lives in the past and believes his daughter akin to him. When she returns from school she tells of having written a play. Fond father decides to have the play produced and invites the leading critics to be present at his home. Then he discovers that his daughter has written a problem play. It will be the first presentation in San Francisco.

For the remainder of the week Ibsen's "Hedda Gabler" will be the attraction at the Maitland.

Thousands of Washington's war workers whose names did not appear in the estimate books of the various departments were paid by lump appropriations. This is the tangle which Congress will have to straighten out in the next session.

"That millionaire who was sued for breach of promise is no fool." "How is that?" "He hired a lady lawyer to defend him who was better looking than the fair plaintiff."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

PICTURES.

People who love color should not fail to see the remarkable exhibit of the Grosbeck pictures in the Rahjohn & Marcom gallery. The artist is an unusual colorist and a vigorous depicter of unbridled action. His pictures are characterized by a virile joy in creation, even though they may be portraying tragedy.

Mr. Grosbeck has many war pictures in the exhibit, among the most striking of which are those of the war horses, whose distended eyes and nostrils express the frenzies of terror suffered by these patient, unresisting slaves. There are groups of plodding refugees, some fine examples of the artist's delight in architecture, and every painting is characterized by remarkable beauty of color, the artist showing an especial affinity for blue—a wonderful blue blent with turquoise and green—and orange.

There is also an exhibit of Mr. Grosbeck's work in black and white.

* * *

At the Print Rooms there is an exhibition of local interest. It consists of the work of Miss Miriam Gerstle, a young girl in her early teens. Some of the pictures show such immaturity of stroke that it is rather a mistake to have added them to the exhibit. The principal qualities of the young lady are, however, originality, unconventionality, and a decided feeling for the grotesque. She brings out the individuality of her subjects, or perhaps imagines it into them. At any rate there is an arresting quality to her portraits, and the series of illustrations of Eastern tales show undoubted and unusual talent. "Hagar," "The Woman," "The Courtesan," "A Manchu Legend" are interesting examples of the young lady's marked talent for patterning her composition and infusing her pictures with the spirit of the Orient, while "Lilith" has that peculiar exoticism and exaggeration of treatment characteristic of the artistic grotesquerie of Aubrey Beardsley.

Charles Hackett.

"Every Italian opera railbird in New York was at the Metropolitan last night to hear a remarkable new tenor who had made a reputation in Italy during the war."

The foregoing was the introduction to a story which appeared in the New York Times, following the impressive debut of Charles Hackett, the brilliant American tenor, who will be heard at the Scottish Rite Auditorium, December 5th, in joint recital with Raoul Vidas, the young Roumanian-French violinist, under the management of Frank W. Healy. The story continues: "Hackett has a high, clear voice and even clearer enunciation, as shown in that first aria. As Almaviva he was a charming figure of youth, high spirits, lover-like ardor; indeed, change Charles to James K., and Count Almaviva could have been Rupert of Hentzau hack on last night's stage."

But aside from distinguished appearance, Mr. Hackett has as a singer also the elusive quality called style, and no opera was more calculated to display it than Rossini's aristocratic old comedy of music and manners in Seville."

Other artists to be presented by Mr. Healy are Louis Graveure, Belgian haritone, January 18th; Leo Ornstein, pianist, March 4th, and Frances Alda, soprano, April 3d.

So acute is the housing shortage in Calcutta, India, that work has been started on two camps on the outskirts of the city, where the homeless will be put up in tents or in huts if possible. Arrangements are being made to cater to the occupants of the camps at a moderate price, and every effort is being made to keep the charges as low as possible. "Winter" in Calcutta is ideal and life in the camps will not be a great hardship. Plans for the construction of the camps were precipitated by the news that the Prince of Wales might visit the city. This would bring thousands of visitors, for whom there would be no accommodations. Even in the "off" season there has been a shortage of rooms and rents are high despite the recent Rent Act, and with the return of residents who have been away for the summer many will be unable to find accommodations in the city.

Air travel over the English Channel is becoming almost as common as ferry traffic. A new line is to be established between London and Amsterdam.

Kolh and Dill will follow "Listen Lester" at the Columbia Theatre, offering their new production of "The High Cost of Loving."

Happy Belgium.

Every one knows that Belgium has made extraordinary progress in its work of rehabilitation. With the signing of the armistice the whole country became a hive of industry. There were labor troubles, but they were purely economic and not political. At a time when Bolshevism reared its head in nearly every other country Belgium seemed to be exempt. The moment the nation was liberated from the German incubus it bent its back to the work of reconstruction, and with results that are the admiration of the world.

These are the obvious facts, and now they are rather startlingly explained by Eugeni Artom in La Tribuna of Rome. Belgium, says Mr. Artom, was almost entirely occupied by German troops and its government practically ceased to exist, or at least to function. To the casual glance this may seem to be a misfortune, but actually it was a beneficence. There being no government, there could be no governmental interference or regulation. The machinery of commercial and economic life was momentarily frozen, so to speak, but it was not changed. All that was necessary on the German withdrawal was to set the wheels again in motion and the mechanism began to work in the old way. The German occupation was bad enough, but at least Belgium was spared from the busy and mischievous hands of its own officialism.

Enough said! We have "been there" ourselves, and we know. Most of the other war countries know also. All alike experienced the sudden and enormous expansion of government activities, the fever of regulation and organization that pervaded them, the horde of incompetent and pretentious theorists whose meddling fingers were thrust into every mechanism of life to its undoing, and that constituted a plague subsidiary in its mischief only to the war itself. Now that the war is over we have to get rid of these pests, but Belgium never had them. And it need not be said that the pests do not want to go. Regulation is their long suit, and particularly the regulation of things that need never have been regulated at all. It will take us years to unwind ourselves from the cocoons of red tape that have been spun around us, to get rid of the inspectors with their infernal note-books, the agents, the secretaries, the bureaucrats, and the reconstructionists. It may be doubted if we shall ever get rid of them except by main strength, for "they seldom die and they never resign."

Happy Belgium with no war government, with nothing worse than Germans to contend against. No wonder she is prosperous.

Sinn Fein versus America.

The riot that disgraced New York on November 25th and that resulted in the practical destruction of the Union Club brings us face to face with a problem that must be settled speedily and settled in the right way. We must know whether this nation is to be governed by Americans and in accord with American ideas, or whether it exists for the furtherance of Irish ambitions and the wreaking of Irish vengeance. At the present moment the question seems to be in doubt.

The main facts will be remembered. A congregation of some five thousand persons who had attended a MacSwiney memorial mass at St. Peter's Cathedral was suddenly transformed into an infuriated mob by the sight of a British flag displayed on the premises of the Union Club. The British flag was not alone. There were also the American and the French flags in honor of the Allied war nations. A ferocious attack upon the club was at once directed by the whole of the congregation and the building was practically wrecked and its contents destroyed. Order was eventually restored by the police, who arrested some four or five persons, including a representative of the club, who was charged with carrying a sword cane. Mgr. Lavelle seems to have done what he could to restrain the mob, although he, too, made a demand for the removal of the British flag, a demand that was properly refused.

The incident would be disquieting enough if it were no more than an isolated explosion of superheated Irish nationalism. But it was very much more than that. It was the expression of a conviction long entertained by certain classes of Irishmen and of which they would now do well to rid themselves, a conviction that they occupy in America some sort of a favored position, and that law and order in America must always be subservient to the violent dictates of their divided patriotisms. They may urge in extenuation of their crimes the kindly toleration that has usually been extended to them, but they must now be warned that such toleration is at an end and that the government of the United States is not a branch of the Sinn Fein. Furthermore it may be said that those few Americans who try to advance their own political fortunes by truckling to Irish influence and palliating Irish misconduct are about to find that they can not serve two masters, and that "loyalty" to Ireland will imply disloyalty to America. During the war we were confronted with the nuisance of the German-American. Now comes the no less and affiliated nuisance of the Irish-American. The German-American was suppressed, and sometimes by definitely unpleasant methods, and his successor and coadjutor would now do well to mend his ways lest some worse thing befall him. The treason laws are not dead, and to seek to embroil the United States with a friendly power is an act of treason. Every participant in the New York riot is a traitor to the United States. So is every one who sympathizes with the rioters. The immunity that such persons have enjoyed will not be perpetual.

But there is another and even graver aspect to this question. It is difficult to believe that the Roman Catholic Church would allow itself to participate in a political movement inimical to the policies of this country, that it would use the confidence given to it in America for the advancement of its own sacerdotal or political aims in Europe or elsewhere. Still more difficult is it to believe that the church would have other than a stern condemnation for crime, or even for those agitations that, directly or indirectly, might tend to subvert the authority of the government or to make of it an appanage to any foreign agitation whatsoever. None the less we must face the fact that the five thousand persons who attended the cathedral in New York were so little influenced by the solemnity of that occasion, so little touched by the Christian graces that should have been imparted, that they descended instantly to the level of wild beasts, that Mgr. Lavelle appealed to them to disperse "for the love of Ireland" rather than for the love of America, and that he himself tried to secure the removal of the British flag. Nor can we in any way evade the conviction that the church, if it would, might easily mitigate the murderous hostilities now being waged in Ireland, if only by a stern denunciation of the wanton murder of policemen and of civilians, trapped like rats, unresisting and defenseless. We know nothing and wish to know nothing of the political policies of the church, nor of its temporal aspirations, nor of the diplomacies that it may exercise. But if those political policies and those diplomacies are seeking to make use of the Irish influence in America in order to further aims and hopes that are not distinctly American, then it may be said that the church is on a perilous path, and one from which its best friends would guide it. The church ought not to associate itself with movements inimical to the policies of the American government. It ought not to incite nor to permit any hostility against any foreign flag. It ought not to countenance the Sinn Fein contention that the Irish flag may be displayed upon all occasions, but that whoever displays another foreign flag shall be stoned. If it must be said—and it is now emphatically said—that the government of the United States is not an appanage of the Sinn Fein, so, and with equal emphasis, must it be said that it is not an appanage of the Vatican.

Candor compels the admission that the swollen and offensive audacities of the Sinn Fein in America are largely the product of the base truckling for votes that characterizes so many of our politicians and statesmen. It is veritably the curse of our political life, repulsive to every honest dignity, an abiding rebuff to the self-respect that is thus warned from the political field. The merit of every question is judged only by the votes that are involved. A mean and pitiful counting of heads is the arbiter of every decision, it dictates every opinion, governs every speech, and controls every pen. It is the hope of the criminal and the despair of the honest litigant. It pervades every branch of our official life. It is the fruitful parent of corruption, injustice, and cruelty. And in the end it must mean the destruction of democracy and of all those popular powers that are now so misused.

It is strange that so few of our statesmen have learned the power of popular appeal that comes from independent and fearless speech, from the manful utterance of free and unbiased opinion. The average voter places a far higher value upon character than upon creed. He esteems courage far more than the mis-expediences, the paltry suppressions and evasions by which the average politician tries to prove his fitness or to hide his moral incapacities. Unfortunately the average voter usually has no other choice than between rival cowardices meanly trying to conciliate and to hoodwink as many factions as possible and without the smallest concession to honest conviction. Small wonder that the Sinn Fein should take advantage of such a situation, that it should relentlessly use the bludgeon of its many votes to compel and to coerce those whose only standard is votes, who have no other gauge of good and evil than the ballot-box.

Puritanism by Law.

It would be well to refrain from the laughter naturally evoked by the proposal to place all Sunday activities under Federal control and to secure that end by means of an amendment to the Constitution. We may awake some fine morning to find that it has been done.

As a matter of fact the movement is actually on foot, and when we learn that it is sponsored by the same agencies that steered the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act into port we may be excused for taking the business somewhat seriously. The Anti-Saloon League at the present moment is more powerful than the government of the United States. Legislatures fawn upon it and obey its orders with abject eagerness. Congress is its most humble and obedient servant, hastening to sign upon the dotted line any law presented to it. If the Anti-Saloon League intends to compel us to go to church on Sunday, it seems likely that to church we shall have to go—or to jail. There was a time when wholesale infringements of personal liberty were impossible in America, but that time has passed. If the policeman may forbid us to drink a glass of wine by our own firesides why may not the policeman herd us to church or take our children to Sunday-school in the patrol wagon? If the prohibition law is constitutional—and the Supreme Court says that it is—why should it not be equally constitutional to compel us to go to church or at least to compel us not to go to the movie? If the Federal government may make it a crime to drink a glass of beer why may it not equally be a crime to smoke a cigar or to drink a cup of coffee?

The advocate of Puritan legislation has now the strongest possible case for himself, indeed an irresistible case. He may argue with fine plausibility that if we may be coerced into the saving of our bodies, how much more important that we be similarly coerced into the saving of our souls. The argument may lack force in the great centres of population, where the saving of our souls has been intelligently relegated to individual effort, but it would by no means lack force throughout rural America, where church attendance is the preëminent sign of grace. Wherever there is an acceptance of the old theology there also is a fertile soil of public opinion for the sowing of Puritan seed. The nation is by no means represented by the people who crowd the busy metropolitan street.

It has been said cynically but truly that there is no conceivable Puritan legislation that can not be passed in America by the aid of money and an adroit use of the necessary mechanism. We all know something of that mechanism, but the Anti-Saloon League knows it all. It knows the exact effect to be produced by its swarms of lecturers, clergymen, physicians, and press agents, by its "drives," "days," hikes, crusades, lobbies, and special Sundays. It has only to press the button and its army of hired reformers begins to move. A few years ago such a picture would have been a ludicrous one, but it is not a ludicrous one now. We know now that there are no limits to the oppression that majorities may exercise upon minorities in the name of democracy. We know also that the liberties for which men were once willing to die are now lightly thrown into the gamble of the ballot-box. Certainly there is nothing to laugh at in the new constitutional amendment intended to regulate our Sunday activities.

Greece—Who Next?

A proverbial national ingratitude once more finds expression in the Greek elections. Venizelos has been rejected, and there can be little doubt that Constantine will be invited to return unless there are objections from France and Great Britain, which is hardly likely. The Greek people can govern themselves or be governed in any way they please. At the same time they may discover a vast difference between the good-will and the ill-will of the western European powers. Constantine will find that his kingdom has nearly doubled in size under the strong hand of Venizelos. Can he keep his gains without the western sympathies and aid that made them possible? It is much to be doubted. At the present moment the Greeks are fighting against the Turks, and the new premier, Rhallis, is preparing for fresh efforts against the enemy. But it is supposed to be a desire for peace that led to the overthrow of Venizelos on the general principle that the Greeks always want some new thing. Greece will lose her gains unless she is prepared to defend them. The elections seem to show that she has no such intention.

In the meantime we may suppose that all the exiled kings are jubilant. They see the beginnings of an era of reaction, and they are wondering what place they will have upon the list. None need despair. There will be a stirring of dry bones even in far-away Amerongen as the sister of the Kaiser recalls the promises of restoration made to her by her imperial brother.

We were a little premature when we assumed that the end of the war meant also the end of royalties. We forgot the law of reaction that has now shown itself in Greece, and that is obviously stirring in Austria, Hungary, Bavaria, and elsewhere. The shifting winds are quite as likely to favor autocracies as democracies.

Mr. Ford, Anti-Semite.

Mr. Isaac Landman, editor of the American Hebrew, has made a tactical mistake in challenging Mr. Henry Ford to a public investigation of his charges against the Jews of the world. In the first place Mr. Ford is mentally incapable of an intelligent response to this or any other question except gas engines. And those who take Mr. Ford seriously are not likely to be influenced by rules of evidence that lie outside the sphere of what they are pleased to call their minds. Moreover, a challenge is precisely what Mr. Ford wants. Publicity is his breath of life.

None the less the matter is not without its serious aspects. Mr. Ford owns a daily newspaper, and it has the wide audience that wealth can always give to any eccentricity. His peculiar brand of an atrocious anti-Semitism takes the form of reiterated assertions of a conspiracy "to establish a Jewish imperialism over the world," and that such conspiracy exists "with the cognizance and active support of certain individuals, and these individuals must have somewhere an official head." Now this rubbish was not invented by Mr. Ford. He only adopted it. Its origin is a certain book now notorious throughout Europe, and shamelessly circulated and defended by various highly placed people who ought to know better and who do know better. The book, in its turn, is based on an inflammatory document said to be in secret circulation among the Jews of the world and expressive of their malign intentions. It was first issued very many years ago as a part of the anti-Semitism of that day. It has now been resurrected, amended, and brought up to date in an effort, already largely successful, to revive one of the most hateful movements that the world has ever known. The new anti-Semitism is already active in Europe and is said to be growing fast in that poisoned soil. The effort to propagate it in America is an act of Satanism, and Mr. Ford seems to be the agent of that Satanism.

Mr. Ford is commonly said to be a self-made man. He is not in the least a self-made man. The only thing that he ever made is a gas engine, and the resulting millions that amply rewarded him. It was popular credulity that made Mr. Ford, the pernicious tendency to fawn upon any man who has made a conspicuous financial success of anything. When we have said that Mr. Ford has displayed a remarkable mechanical cleverness we have said everything that can be said in his favor. Over and above that he is a pestilent nuisance. He began to be a nuisance when in the silliness of his vanity he despatched his Peace Ship to Europe. His vanity was still further inflamed when President Wilson sent for him to consult on the state of the nation and eagerly recommended him for election to the Senate. Incredibly ignorant and vain, he began to think of himself as a sort of "red" Messiah commissioned from on high to promulgate a peculiarly ugly form of radical internationalism. In almost any other country he would never have been thought of except as a clever automobile maker, perhaps to be rewarded by some trumpery decoration of the fourth class, although in recent years his reward would probably have been a term in some European jail for treason. But here he is made the confidant of rulers. He becomes an expert on matters of government of which he knows no more than the man in the moon. And it is only by the undeserved blessings of Providence that he is not at this moment in the United States Senate. But however mischievous his record may be, he seems now to be intent upon worsening it by fomenting one of the most infamous forms of religious hatred.

The Two Vanderlips.

American merchants need be under no apprehensions that Mr. W. D. Vanderlip has stolen a march on them by the concession granted to him by the Russian government. Doubtless they could all have similar concessions if they took the trouble to ask for them, and particularly if they happened to have names suggestive of banking responsibilities. Readers of the Argonaut are hardly likely to confuse Mr. W. D. Vanderlip with Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, but there can be no doubt that this confusion exists in thousands of minds who now believe that Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, the banker, has successfully entered into negotiations with the Bolshevik chiefs and finds them on the whole to be very good fellows. Mr. W. D. Vanderlip, who has obtained the concession for a piece of frozen wilderness in eastern Siberia, is an adventurous prospector already well known in Alaska and who is now intent upon trying his luck elsewhere. He is in no way connected with Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, although the Russian officials in announcing the deal were careful to suppress his initials in order to produce the confusion that now exists.

Mr. W. D. Vanderlip seems to be a Bolshevik, naked and unashamed. Interviewed in London, he almost wept with emotion as he contemplated the moral splendors of the Soviet chiefs. The New York Herald quotes him as saying: "Lenin is not only a Washington, a Lincoln; he is both. * * * Fifty years ago Lincoln was defiled and crucified the world over. Now they have placed a beautiful statue of him in the heart of London, facing Westminster. Washington built up our government; Lincoln freed 3,000,000 people and held our Union together. Now Lenin is building a government and freeing 150,000,000 people. It will not be many years before they will have a statue of him here in London."

But we need not trouble ourselves with the political opinions of Mr. W. D. Vanderlip. It is hardly possible to imagine anything less important. All that we need know is the one fact that Mr. W. D. Vanderlip is not Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip.

Our Experts.

It is evident that lean years are ahead for our intellectual experts who have been shedding the light of their erudition upon Washington. Since 1913 they have had a glorious time playing with that magnificent toy, the government of the United States. The school men and the writing men, the self-confessed sociologists, the critics of things as they are who would show the world how to lift itself by its bootstraps, the visionaries, the pinks and the pale reds, have run riot through the government structure, careless and happy as children taking a clock apart to find whence comes the tick. They have not found the tick, they can not get the works back into place, they have done infinite damage to the house, they have piled up gigantic burdens of costs, and have made the family a nuisance to the neighbors. Now their playthings have been taken away from them and they have been turned out to make their own living, and a new control has been established to set the house in order.

The net results have been to discredit the value of academic minds in conducting the business of the government. The scholar has suffered in popular estimation. The demand of the day, as voiced at the polls on November 2d, is for practical common sense in public affairs and a minimum of untried theories.

But, it would appear, the nation is not entirely rid of the academic minds. They are to set up what is equivalent to a political salon at Washington, to offer that critical comment on the conduct of the government for which they think they are equipped. Thus we expect to see the Washington home of President Wilson after March 4th become the intellectual centre of that group, the degree of its activity depending on the condition of Mr. Wilson's health.

There is no reason why a political salon such as this should not have a career in Washington. Whether Mr. Wilson will show good taste in continuing his residence at the capital is another matter and one for his own decision. Senator Harding's cabinet, if it shall come up to expectation, is not likely to be dismayed by the criticism of Mr. Baker, Mr. Daniels, or Mr. Burleson. It is more likely to be amused, and the country with it.

Editorial Notes.

Mr. De Valera made a mistake when he allowed himself to defend the assassination of Irish policemen and soldiers on the ground that they were "enemy spies" who rightly deserved death for their activities. He may have elicited a cheap cheer from his auditors by this condonation of murder, but the American people at large did not cheer him. Here in America there is a detestation of murder, no matter what its object. There may also be some apprehension as to the effect upon our own malcontents of a doctrine that murder is a legitimate weapon of the agitator and that the worst of crimes becomes lawful when committed in the name of freedom.

One of the largest religious bodies in America demands that the protection of the flag be refused to all American citizens who "in foreign lands are doing that which is outlawed at home." It need hardly be said that this refers to prohibition. But why stop here? Why take two bites at the cherry? Why not demand a severance of diplomatic relations with all foreign governments refusing to conform their own laws with the Eighteenth Amendment?

It is evident that the British voter does not intend to be dragged at the wheel of the labor chariot. The following summary of the results of the recent municipal elections is furnished by the Weekly Review, which says: "In the seventy-one leading boroughs, according to the London Times, the Labor party nominated 747 candidates, but returned only 199. In Bradford not one of the twenty-three Labor candidates was elected, in Birmingham they secured only two seats out of twenty-three attacked, in Plymouth two out of twenty, in Southampton three out of twenty-four. In all the great industrial centres, in fact, including Liverpool, Birkenhead, Manchester, Huddersfield, Leeds, Cardiff, Oldham, Warrington, the Labor candidates were turned down by the electorate. The most significant feature of this victory is the fact that the working class itself contributed to this defeat of the men professing to speak for them. In Liverpool not one in five of the hundred thousand workingmen who pay subscriptions to the Labor party voted for Labor candidates, with the result that all of them were rejected."

Your unflinching kindness to us through all these years has always been a tremendous assistance to us in carrying on our work in caring for the sick. The fourth estate, referring to newspaper workers, is credited to Edmund Burke, who is quoted in Thomas Carlyle's fifth lecture on "Heroes and Hero Worship" as saying: "There are three estates in Parliament, but in the reporters' gallery yonder there sits a fourth estate, more important far than they all." This was in 1839. In this country, where class distinctions are not made politically, little is ever heard of the three estates, the nobility, clergy, and the people, but the term "fourth estate" is comparatively common.

Discovery of a race of pygmies, averaging only four feet in height, is reported by an explorer who returned from Central Africa. The tribe is called the Mambuti and they are known as daring hunters of elephants and rhinoceroses.

A total of 6978 persons were killed and 149,053 injured on United States railroads during 1919.

GORKY ON LENIN.

At the beginning of the Russian revolution its most implacable enemy seemed to be Maxim Gorky. Today Maxim Gorky supports the revolution and hails Lenin as the savior of Russia and of the world. We are not told what has produced the transformation. It is enough that it exists.

Gorky tells us in the pages of L'Humanité what he thinks of Lenin. Perhaps we need not take Gorky too seriously nor absolve him from those enthusiasms that rightly belong to the literary artist, but that are not among the highest qualifications of the historian or the statesman. But at least Gorky is always interesting. We lose nothing by occupying momentarily his point of vision.

Lenin himself holds the view that the part played by the individual in the development of civilization is negligible. None the less Gorky thinks that without Lenin the revolution would never have been what it is. And there, of course, he is right:

Once I compared Lenin relatively with Peter the Great, and the comparison was treated with scorn and regarded as extravagant. But it was a relative comparison: in my opinion Lenin's rôle as a Russian social reformer is less important than as a world revolutionary. He is not only the man to whose will history has entrusted the terrible task of stirring to its very depths that human ant-hill, variegated, ill-constructed, and idle, known as Russia; his untiring will is a battering-ram, the blows of which are shattering the monumental constructions of western capitalist states, and the primeval blocks of despotic and hateful eastern empires.

Gorky is mightily indignant with those people who accuse Lenin of instigating civil war and the terror while they have only praise for those others who prolong the Russian misery in order that they may perpetuate the mould and rust of an ancient and doomed society:

All these "great men"; the most infamous of cynics, Clemenceau; the "naïve and romantic democrat," Woodrow Wilson; the Socialists who voted credits for the organization of the European war; the scientific men who invented asphyxiating gases and other horrors; the poets who cursed the Germans in 1914 and the English in 1918; all the mould and rust of an ancient society in decomposition has dealt a deep, perhaps a mortal, wound to European civilization with its base hand; this it is which with refined cruelty is continuing the torment of Russia by contributing to the continuation of the civil war, stifling our country by the blockade, killing our little children with hunger and cold.

Errors, if we must speak of them, are not crimes. Lenin's errors are those of an honest man, and there has never yet been a single reformer in the world whose actions have been infallible. But those others, Lloyd George, Clemenceau, and their like, act undoubtedly like convicts and professional assassins when they condemn a whole people to the torments of hunger and cold, and when they encourage the continuation of a wholly meaningless civil war, for except "Bolsheviks" there is no force in Russia capable of holding power and rousing in the exhausted country the energies which are essential to productive labor.

Gorky assures us that his personal sympathy with Lenin plays no part in what he writes of him, but here we must be allowed to judge for ourselves on internal evidence. He regards Lenin as a being under observation, and then he gives us an impression of Lenin's speeches:

This man is speaking at a meeting of workers; he uses very simple words, with a tongue as sharp as steel and logic as incisive as an axe; but in his rough speech I have never heard coarse, demagogic expressions, nor any banal seeking for fine phrases. He speaks always on the same theme: the need of uprooting social inequality among men, and the means of accomplishing this. This ancient truth comes from his lips with a rough and implacable sound; you always feel that he believes in it unshakably; you feel how calm is his faith, the faith of a fanatic, but of a scholar-fanatic, not a metaphysician or a mystic.

It seems to me that what concerns the individual scarcely interests him at all; he thinks only of parties, masses, states, and there he has the genius' gift of foresight, the intuition of an experimental thinker. He has the happy clarity of thought which is attained only by intensive and uninterrupted labors.

Gorky, having swallowed the revolution, swallows with equal avidity all that the revolution implies. He compares modern civilization with ancient Rome and demands its destruction:

It is natural that Lenin should appear to the small bourgeoisie in all countries like an Attila come to destroy the Rome of bourgeois comfort and well-being, based on slavery, bloodshed, and robbery. But just as ancient Rome deserved her fall, so the crimes of the world of today justify the necessity for its destruction. It is a historic necessity: nothing, nobody can avert it.

We hear protests about the worth of European civilization, the necessity of defending it against the invasion of the modern Huns. . . . These words are not sincere, and have no meaning except from the lips of a revolutionary; but from the lips of the organizers and accomplices of the shameful massacre of 1914-1918 they are loathsome lies.

The revolutionist can always construct—in imagination—the universe that is to be. He can always see visions and dream dreams, and usually they become for him, if for no one else, a living reality. And so Gorky asks, What is Lenin's vision of the new world?

And I see the magnificent picture of the world as a great jewel, adorned with the facets of the labors of free humanity. All men are reasonable, and each is conscious of personal responsibility for all that he does or that is done around him. Everywhere garden cities enclosing majestic palaces; everywhere the forces of nature, subjected and organized by the mind of man, work for man, and he himself has at last become the true ruler of the elements. His physical strength is no longer wasted in coarse and dirty labor; it is transformed into mental energy, and all his powers are devoted to the study of the fundamental problems of life, to the solution of which thought has been applied in vain for centuries, because it was disturbed and dispersed in necessary efforts to explain and justify the phenomena of the social struggle, and crushed by the conflict between two irreconcilable principles.

Labor, made nobler by technical science and adapted to social requirements, has become the joy of man. Human reason—the most precious principle in the world—really set free at last, has become fearless.

How like it all seems to the speeches of Robespierre a hundred years ago. Iridescent dreams drowned in blood. A roadway to the stars paved with the tortured bodies of men. Be my brother—or I will kill you. Says Gorky again:

I do not think that I have ascribed to Lenin dreams to which he is a stranger; I do not think that I have surrounded this man with romantic glamour; I can not imagine him in my own mind without this magnificent dream of the future happiness of all creatures and of a luminous and joyful life. The greater a man is the bolder are his dreams.

Lenin is more of a man than any of our contemporaries, and although his thoughts are obviously occupied in the first place with political matters, which a romanticist might call "narrowly practical," I am convinced that in his rare moments of relaxation this militant idealism carries him on into a future of far greater beauty and sees far more than I myself can imagine.

The fundamental aim of Lenin's whole life is the happiness of mankind, and that is why he must of necessity catch a glimpse, far down the centuries to come, of the end of that magnificent process to the initiation of which he has devoted all his will-power with the courage of an ascetic. He is an idealist, if by that we mean the concentration of all energies on one single idea: the idea of the general happiness. His private life is such that in an age of strong religious faith Lenin would have been regarded as a saint.

It is a pleasant picture, and, once more, how strangely like the pictures of Robespierre, of whom Lenin must surely be the reincarnation. Few more tender-hearted than Robespierre or with more shrinking from the torrents of blood through which he waded. Evidently one must beware of these men who are thus devoted to the happiness of the race. They are dangerous. Lenin, like Robespierre, suffers intolerably at the thought of killing:

Sometimes the flame of an almost womanly tenderness for man burns through this rough policy, and I am sure that the terror has caused him intolerable sufferings, although he can hide them very cleverly. It is unlikely and unthinkable that men whom history forces into the irreconcilable contradiction of killing some for the sake of the liberty of others should not suffer soul-crushing torments. I have seen eyes in which this poignant suffering is written for life and can not be erased. I have a physical shrinking from all kinds of murder, but these men are martyrs, and my conscience would never allow me to condemn them.

I find that in talking of Lenin one wants involuntarily to talk of all kinds of things—and clearly it could not be otherwise in speaking of a man who is at the centre of everything and above everything. Of course it would be possible to say many more things about him individually than have been said here. But I am embarrassed by the man's modesty, his total lack of ambition: I know that what little I have said will seem to him superfluous, exaggerated, and absurd. Well, let him laugh, as he well knows how; but I hope that many people will read these words not without profit to themselves.

I am writing of a man who had the temerity to set in motion the process of the social revolution in Europe in a country where a large number of peasants want to become well-fed bourgeois and nothing more. Many regard this temerity as madness. I began my work as instigator of the revolutionary spirit with a hymn to the madness of brave men.

And among all the mad men, says Gorky, Vladimir Lenin is the first and the most mad.

ARNOLD BENNETT AND "OUR WOMEN."

W. L. Courtney in the "Daily Telegraph."

There are many reasons, doubtless, why we should peruse with careful attention Mr. Arnold Bennett's book entitled "Our Women." But there is one very interesting reason. At the end of the book he describes to us an ordinary, everyday quarrel between husband and wife—not very serious, concerned with small points, but sufficiently disconcerting to both parties involved in the quarrel, and therefore very typical of what Mr. Bennett calls "sex-discord." He describes it first from the point of view of the man, who naturally thinks himself tremendously aggrieved, and next from the point of view of the woman, who is equally sure that she is in the right and her husband monstrously wrong. The same incident wears a perfectly different look as approached from the two sides, and the obvious moral is that a good deal more than half of conjugal difficulties would never occur if it were possible for the ordinary human being to regard an incident, not from his own point of view, but from that of others, and especially the other party in the dispute. It is an exceedingly happy illustration of those smaller, non-essential things with which the average philosopher fails to concern himself, but which in reality make all the difference between placid contentment and an emotional life punctuated by stormy episodes.

Nevertheless, though he is so successful in this, Mr. Arnold Bennett must be accounted a brave man. Why? The reasons are manifold. In the first place, in writing about "Our Women," an author must of necessity deal with his own experience, and that very likely is not shared by others. He advances to wide generalizations based on particular instances. Women are careful to point out this defect of logic, for it complicates the question in more ways than one. The favorite criticism to pass on the feminine mind is that it is incapable of forming generalizations, and that it exaggerates particular instances. But here is a case in which a man writing about the other sex does indeed lay down wide and general statements, but does it on the strength of exactly those singular and isolated data which he blames the woman for considering too highly. Moreover, it is very obvious that, while many books are written about the characteristics of women, very few have as their subject the characteristics of men. The obvious explanations are that men are too uninteresting for a general study, or perhaps they are too much alike, or it might even be found that a woman critic is too well aware of the limitations to her experience to venture on the difficult and shifting grounds of psychological analysis.

Many other considerations come into this question. Men are more or less alike. That is the result of a public school training supplemented by university discipline, the total result being that not only young men, but also middle-aged men, retain the impress of their past education, and having assimilated it more or less in the same fashion are as a matter of fact as like as two peas. Women, just because they have not undergone the peculiar discipline of the male, and perhaps because nature has been more prodigally bountiful to them, differ very widely from one another. That adds to the interest, but also makes it much more difficult to arrive at conclusions. The man who writes down his views perhaps only knows a few varieties, and perhaps is even foolish enough to think that the few varieties he knows exhaust the whole category. Books like that which Mr. Arnold Bennett has written are often read very carefully by males, but are apt to be neglected by female readers. The latter know that their sex is infinitely diverse, and that part of the empire which they exercise over humanity rests on the fact that after every analysis they remain more or less of a mystery. It is only a very young man or a fool who will declare that he understands women.

The question is, what should be our starting point in an inquiry of this kind. There is no doubt about Mr. Bennett's starting point. He begins with the assumption that there is, and always has been, a "sex-discord." Conditions and circumstances no doubt vary in the different ages, but the central element remains always the same, and the tragedy of the situation is that, while it is true to say that man is the complement of woman and woman the complement of man, yet they are eternally antagonistic. Probably women are more aware of this rivalry than men are. Men in that easy complacent superiority, which many of them think they possess, dismiss sex discord as a negligible thing. Surrounded by the many conditions which support and maintain them in their fancied position of superiority, they ignore or explain away the notion of rivalry, whereas the woman, who has all along had to struggle in order to achieve her present status, is only too conscious that she must make use of every wise and wily feminine device to hold her own. I suppose there is nothing except the "aesthetic temperament" which is so widely discussed as the notion of "sex-discord." It runs through nearly every one of the novels produced in our modern age. It is probably exaggerated, for we are very much the victims of words. Just as the aesthetic temperament is supposed to excuse the ordinary obligations of morality, so the sex discord is accounted as a potent reason why marriage is so perilous an institution.

It is not easy, of course, to say what is the chief and predominant quality in the female mind, but almost certainly it is not a consciousness of sex discord. Probably it is the "mothering" instinct which, obviously, blunts the edge of sexual rivalry. It is a platitude, no doubt, to assert that every woman is a born mother, but this is a case in which one need not be afraid of platitudes, because discussion of the subject is generally vitiated by an absurd desire to score points and excoigate epigrams, however paradoxical and absurd. Every woman is a born mother, and if she does not find something to mother she is a disappointed failure. Anything will serve as a reason for the exercise of her maternal instinct, but something, if it is only a cat or a dog, she must have. The normal woman in happier circumstances not only tries to mother her children, but, above all, accepts the position of mother with regard to her husband. And here follows a very widely-spread mistake on the part of her masculine critics. They regard her from their own point of view as the wife who has charm, the companion who has sympathy, the possession or chattel which completes their life and satisfies their physical and social instincts.

But the strongest element in women is, if we take the large average, not a craving for love or wealth or social prestige, but the consciousness that she must have something to look after and tend and manage, and even protect from others. From this follow her chief excellences and her chief defects. Her tenderness and sympathy rest on the fact that she knows how valuable she is as a nurse or guardian. But from this, too, comes a less lovely thing—the instinct to domineer. Such a result is, of course, not inevitable, but it not seldom occurs. She can not conceive of a happiness other than that which appeals to herself; she rarely allows the object of her affection to be the architect of his own happiness. It is happiness as she understands it that she wants to secure for the male, and this contrast or discord between two different ideals—the male ideal of comfort, the female ideal of success—is the blot whence spring ugly features which we associate with sex discord.

Mr. Arnold Bennett repeats the old dogma that women like to be mastered and controlled, but in many cases that is not true. It may or may not be for her happiness that she should be controlled and mastered, but her own opinion is widely diverse. She knows that Nature has given her the most important and solemn function of supplying the state with citizens. Whether she realizes it or not, she is the finished product which Nature thinks most about, and just because she fulfills so grandiose a task she feels that any other position than that of superiority is intolerable. A girl alternately worshipping and bullying her dolls is only the first imperfect sketch of a woman cajoling, adoring, mastering, and domineering her male associates. But whatever general remarks one cares to make on a difficult subject of this kind, every critic must end with the acknowledgment that the subject is too diverse and too complex to be finished off-hand. It is possible, for instance, that the "Grande Amoureuse" has not got the maternal instinct fully developed. It is also possible that education and an increasing experience in worldly matters, especially in businesses hitherto confined to men, may gradually alter feminine characteristics. As Mr. Bennett points out, education and new modes of employment certainly tend to change the old idea of love, but that is, perhaps, too delicate a point for general discussion.

OLD FAVORITES.

The Burial of Sir John Moore.

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
As his corse to the ramparts we hurried;
Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot
O'er the grave where our hero we buried.

We buried him darkly; at dead of night;
The sods with our bayonets turning;
By the struggling moonbeams' misty light,
And the lantern dimly burning.

No useless coffin enclosed his breast,
Nor in sheet nor in shroud we wound him;
But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,
With his martial cloak around him.

Few and short were the prayers we said,
And we spoke not a word of sorrow;
But we steadfastly gazed on the face of the dead,
And we bitterly thought of the morrow.

We thought—as we hollowed his narrow bed,
And smoothed down his lonely pillow—
How the foe and the stranger would tread o'er his head,
And we far away on the billow!

Lightly they'll talk of the spirit that's gone,
And o'er his cold ashes upbraid him;
But little he'll reck, if they let him sleep on
In the grave where a Briton has laid him.

But half of our heavy task was done,
When the clock tolled the hour for retiring,
And we heard the distant and random gun,
That the foe was suddenly firing.

Slowly and sadly we laid him down,
From the field of his fame fresh and gory.
We carved not a line, we raised not a stone,
But left him—alone with his glory! —J. Wolfe.

The May Queen.

You must wake and call me early, call me early, mother dear;
Tomorrow'll be the happiest time of all the glad new year:
Of all the glad new year, mother, the maddest, merriest day;
For I'm to be Queen o' the May, mother, I'm to be Queen o' the May.

I sleep so sound all night, mother, that I shall never wake,
If you do not call me loud, when the day begins to break;
But I must gather knots of flowers, and buds and garlands gay,
For I'm to be Queen o' the May, mother, I'm to be Queen o' the May.

Little Effie shall go with me tomorrow to the green,
And you'll be there too, mother, to see me made the Queen;
For the shepherd lads on every side'll come from far away,
And I'm to be Queen o' the May, mother, I'm to be Queen o' the May.

All the valley, mother, 'll be fresh, and green, and still,
And the cowslip and the crowfoot over all the bill,
And the rivulet in the flowery dale'll merrily glance and play,
For I'm to be Queen o' the May, mother, I'm to be Queen o' the May.

So you must wake and call me early, call me early, mother dear;
Tomorrow'll be the happiest time of all the glad new year;
Tomorrow'll be of all the year the maddest, merriest day,
For I'm to be Queen o' the May, mother, I'm to be Queen o' the May. —Tennyson.

The tarantula is said to have derived its name from the town Taranto, in Italy, where this species of spider is said to be especially common. The graceful dance of the southern Italy, called the tarantella, is the only relic of the tarantism which in early days was supposed to have been produced by the bite of the tarantula. This was a dancing mania, nothing more or less, and the world eventually learned that its real cause was to be found in the epidemic then sweeping the country of an exaggerated hysterical condition, and not from madness and depression distributed into the system by the tarantula's poison.

San Salvador, smallest of the Central American states, is preparing for an inrush of oil men owing to the discovery of petroleum near the eastern frontier.

The ten invaded and pillaged departments of France have produced this year 500,000 tons of wheat and one-fourth of the nation's oat crop.

INDIVIDUALITIES

Mrs. Juliette Low, founder of the Girl Scout movement, is seventy years old.

President Taft's son Robert has been elected to the Ohio house of representatives.

William Hohenzollern has received more than $25,000,000 in salary as King of Prussia since his flight to Holland.

Former German Crown Prince Frederick spends much time making horseshoes at the village blacksmith shop in Wierengen, Holland.

E. O. Excell, noted singer and hymn-writer, was recently reported near death. He began life as a brick-layer, but one day Sam Jones, the evangelist, discovered him singing at his work.

Mrs. W. E. Stone, noted mountain climber, is a woman of marked personality. She radiates cheerfulness from a pleasant face bronzed from outdoor living. Before her marriage, in 1889, she was Miss Victoria Geitmueller. She is well known throughout the Northwest. Her husband, Dr. Winthrop Ellsworth Stone, has been president of Purdue University since 1900.

Miss Mary O'Connor picked a most fitting day for her debut in the motion-picture game eight years ago. It was on the 17th of March that while visiting relatives in San Francisco she received a telegram stating that the script writer of the Vitagraph had fallen and broken his leg and would she please come and take his job. She packed up that morning and left for Los Angeles. Today she is probably one of the highest salaried women in pictures with the exception of some of the big stars.

Vittorio Airoldi, famous Italian pilot instructor, was recently decorated by King Victor. Airoldi was born in California. He has been wounded several times, has five silver ribs, and in one of the last air encounters with an Austrian pilot a bullet from the enemy destroyed his right eye. Although he speaks English it is with a pronounced Italian accent, for he says that despite his American birth and the fact that he spoke English exclusively during his boyhood, long residence abroad, surrounded by Italian officers and soldiers, has made him forget that early vocabulary.

Miss Alice Houston, editorial head of the advertising business of E. B. Wilson, Inc., is a most attractive and thoroughly feminine young woman in appearance and manner. Her voice is low and sweet, but that does not prevent her from presenting her thoughts logically. She was born in Kansas and was graduated from the Kansas University. Then she came straight to New York and got a position as a stenographer. She proved to be a good stenographer and soon commanded a good salary, but it didn't satisfy her to be simply putting down at dictation other persons' thoughts. She had ideas of her own, and as one of the places she obtained was with the Wilson Advertising Agency she soon developed these ideas. They bore fruit at once, and from this beginning Miss Houston went on to invent or apply the inventions of others to effective means of publicity.

Alice Robertson, who was elected to Congress from Oklahoma, was born in the Indian Territory in 1854. The family had settled at Tullahassee Mission, in Wagoner County, near Muskogee, and worked among the Indians during the civil war, undergoing many hardships during that time. Later came the opportunity to attend school at Boston, graduating later from Elmira College, where she took the Master of Arts degree. A position in the Indian Office at Washington was next, but the call to return to the West was too strong, so after a few months under "Miss Corson, first cooking school teacher, and Miss Huntington, first teacher of social welfare work," she returned to the Indian Territory. She became the first domestic science teacher in the territory. She also learned typewriting and shorthand, and was the only stenographer in the section for many years. As such she attended many conventions and learned first hand of political doings and other worldly affairs.

George Julian Zolnay, sculptor, chevalier of the Roumanian Order of Merit and one of the first contemporary artists to declare, long before the great war, the doom to which German kultur was headed, sees a better art as one of the fruits of the insensate conflict. Thoroughly cosmopolitan by education, Zolnay is peculiarly American in spirit, vision, aggressiveness, and executive ability. Obstacles seem easily to give way before his vigorous manner of tackling them. He believes in American art. To help foster it he left New York fifteen years ago in the midst of a prosperous season and set up home and studio in St. Louis. His work at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition as one of the art directors and at the master school of sculpture of the American Woman's League in University City are well known. He shook the dust of New York from his feet when he was both prosperous and beloved, and nine years later St. Louis felt his loss so keenly, when he started for Washington, that seven-column headlines in the daily newspapers proclaimed his decision to go. For he was the same rejuvenating force as president of the St. Louis Artists' Guild as he is now as the president of the Society of Washington Artists and the Arts Club of Washington.

AMERICAN TOWNS AND PEOPLE.

Mr. Harrison Rhodes Describes Some Distinctive Features of East and West.

Is it true that more Bostonians die on Friday than on any other day because they thus make sure of being in the special Saturday night obituary notices? Mr. Harrison Rhodes, who writes of "American Towns and People," does not vouch for the statement. He only says that it is "solemnly asserted." But he seems to believe the story of the unwise stranger who remarked on the extent to which the old Bostonian families had remained in the saddle and who was crushed by the correction that "there are almost no Bostonians living here. Almost all the Bostonian families went back home at the time of the Revolution." Equally illuminating is the story of the American lady in Europe who was asked some question about her compatriots and who replied: "I'm not sure that I'm the best person to ask. You see I'm a New Yorker and I know so few Americans." Mr. Rhodes tells us also of two occupants of orchestra seats at the New York opera who were surveying the ornaments of the boxes, viewing with special pleasure a famous lady in white satin, the more exposed portions of whom were covered with the loveliest pearls. "Yes," commented one of the observers, "Mrs. X is looking wonderful tonight. And I think it's so nice that every one here knows she is such a good mother." Even Chicago does not escape the shafts of the anecdotist, but can it be true that some visitors to Chicago once asked to be shown the lake and upon its being pointed out to them from the windows of the club expressed surprise, since they had supposed that was the Pacific Ocean? Even august Washington does not wholly escape. There was a time when even senators were distinguished by a certain unrepresentable primitiveness, so that when some beau monde ladies said, "We had the senator to dine last night," every one knew who was meant, as there was only one senator who could be trusted to eat in the open.

But we may leave these Eastern insignificances and turn to the latter half of Mr. Rhodes' volume and to his remarks about the West. But Mr. Rhodes is by no means sure that there is a West:

Some cynic of the smoking-room tells you that Los Angeles is the metropolis of Iowa and backs up his paradox by figures proving that a great part of its citizens originate under the government of Des Moines. Once your suspicions are aroused you are, even during the railway journey, intent upon anything which might serve as proof that there really is a West. These indications are not too frequent; the continent was, only lately, crossed with so poor a result as only three prairie-dogs sighted, and one superannuated cowboy of about eighty, who was obviously either a survivor, a mere museum piece, or some decrepit Eastern galvanized into this fancy-dress parade by his memories of Buffalo Bill. The West suddenly becomes shadowy and elusive.

But if the old West is gone, there is still California, and Californianism is something "as amazing and as different as Westernism can ever have been in that earlier day." It is something, says Mr. Rhodes, which would well repay years of loving and intent study:

The Californians, in spite of their comparative hauteur in the Pullman, are accessible enough. Many of them, even on the transcontinental trip, may be "met." Indeed, they travel freely, constantly, and easily to and fro, making nothing of four nights out of Chicago, and training their infant progeny, as may be richly observed in the train, to the same happy facility of movement. (It should be said, parenthetically, that as far as that goes, all over the country motherhood seems merely to incite American women to travel, by preference in sleeping-cars.) These returning Californians have been East for various alleged purposes of business or pleasure. But it is really as missionaries that they have gone, to bring the bright gospel of Californianism to those benighted races which still persist in living east of the High Sierras.

All parts of California are close to the wild places and they are always accessible. The good road and the bad car have attended to that. Camping and all the pioneer crafts are still a real part of a true Californian from childhood on:

Even week-ends and Sundays are used in pleasant outdoor expeditions. In spite of the automobile, the Californians can still walk. Of course they do not use such an old-fashioned expression; they "hike"; this new word, as Boy Scouts have already found, makes a thing that had grown dull a real pleasure. The railway and trolley stations late Saturday afternoon are an amazing sight. They swarm with boys and girls in "hiking" costumes of khaki. The young ladies are all in trim, tight knickers, to be distinguished from the young men only by their superior shape, by their beauty of countenance, and by the students' caps in bright colored velvet which surmount them. There are undoubtedly more young ladies in knickers in California than anywhere else in the world. In some cases there is a woman in skirts along; this strange raiment possibly indicates the chaperon, though more often it would appear that the expedition is undertaken in that Arcadian lack of guile which is still so strong a national characteristic. Did Daphnis and Chloe "hike"? The young ladies are almost always, by a mysterious but welcome dispensation of Providence, small and exquisitely pretty—indeed, they look like moving-picture actresses, which is, of course, the highest Californian praise. And the whole scene has a quality of musical comedy which is gay and invigorating.

It goes without saying that Mr. Rhodes has something to tell us about California morals, and particularly the morals of San Francisco. But can it be true that the Eastern visitor is sometimes disappointed by a decorum alike unsuspected and unwelcome?

Reluctantly shall some space be here given to this same question of Californian morals. It is amusing how cultivated and dashing and intelligent it is always thought in America to attack towns as being Puritanical. Los Angeles was once termed "chemically pure," and it still reels from the blow. The Iowan population would like it to be well understood that life has been considerably jazzed up since its transference to the Coast. San Francisco has, on the other hand, been perhaps too much advertised by its loving but injudicious friends, for it is quite plain to even the tourist's eye that, instead of being the Isle of Cytherea, the place is congested with good and respectable women (often excessively pretty and smart), and that it goes its way, as a busy, lively city should, with not much more nor much less of undue gayety than usually falls to the lot of towns of its size. Yet up and down the length of the state you hear philosophical thinkers asserting that California saps the moral sense.

(Here, indeed, one had best not to be too sure that the wish is not father to the thought. There are ladies who have not succeeded in being very bad in the East and, arriving at the full bloom and California about the same time, have come with the hope of misconduct springing eternal in their very human breasts.)

Mr. Rhodes seems to think that Los Angeles and the "movies" are equal and convertible terms. There are still some cave-dwelling ladies who believe that one may be Angeleno and yet be ignorant of the movie world, but they are fighting a losing fight:

Of course in the social fight against movie people there are naturally dark and desperate stories of dissipation always abroad. If she believed them, no lady, faubourg or otherwise, could fail to react unfavorably. But such legends grow only too easily. We can not be quite sure that the stars give parties so wild that at regular intervals during the long night the local police pass through the rooms and tearfully plead with the hostess to moderate the gayety of the guests—of course no mere policeman would dare give actual orders to a really important movie artist. If such parties take place, those who attend them may be felicitated upon seeing Babylon and Imperial Rome revived. But rigid investigation discloses the fact that many a Hollywood social evening consists merely in the decent yet pleasurable experience of hearing some moving-picture director tell the other guests how great he is. In any case these rumors of an extremely full free life scarcely stem the tide of stellar popularity.

The élite of Los Angeles struggled against the "movie" tide, but they were worsted. Indeed they were even laughed at, and they had to succumb:

You may possibly, at a Los Angeles dinner party, keep the conversation off the pictures while the soup is being served; after that it is difficult. As to the people on the street-cars, in the cafeterias and the hotels, they shamelessly adore the topic. They turn to the movie star as sunflowers to the sun. From ten thousand altars incense burned to the favorites streams toward the unstained California blue. And the United States postal service might reasonably excuse its breakdown by making a statement as to the number of letters received daily by the adored ones from every quarter of the civilized and uncivilized globe.

A good day will bring by the morning post to a really beloved movie actress as many as eighteen hundred and sixty-seven letters from unknown remote worshippers. And there are times when the chief secretary for personal letters and her corps of undersecretaries and stenographers faint beneath the burden. The letters are infinite in variety; they range from those of simple admiration and gratitude for assuagement of soul to the definite statement that the writer is leaving East Esopus by the 10:20 train on Monday and would like to marry the object of his affections as soon as possible after his arrival by the Santa Fé on Saturday. The colossal scale of the movies may be somewhat guessed at by the fact that there are always at the Los Angeles hotels gentlemen who have just come to marry the leading movie actresses or to reclaim the lovely but evil vamps.

The "movie" people are interesting to watch. Here alone success may come overwhelmingly before one is twenty-one, although what terrible thing happens to "movie" actresses of thirty one can not imagine:

All the things you read about in the newspapers do really happen in the Los Angeles and Hollywood hotels. You may come home to lunch and find that they have been shooting a picture in the office and that the company in full finery and paint are lunching all around your own table. There may be, for example, a bride in white satin and orange blossoms, lovely ladies in evening dress, distinguished old men—Heaven only knows what they represent—covered with foreign orders, and once there was—oh, fair and unforgettable memory!—a ravishing small actress, dressed, for some dark reason, as a jockey in pale blue, tight-fitting waistcoat, and a smart blue broadcloth jacket! The contrast to the respectable families from the Middle West who occupied the other tables near by was piquant, and the experience, let us hope, for everybody broadening.

It is only about five years ago that the pioneers of the new bonanza came to California. They thought there might be something in the pictures, but these pioneers are now the old aristocratic picture families:

Before the stories are forgotten some one should write the history of this bonanza period. It was like '49 and the rush for California gold, or like Virginia City when fortunes in Nevada silver mines were made overnight. In January a man was driving a taxicab, in June he was directing moving pictures. In October actors from the East were horrowing five dollars to pay for hall bedrooms, in the spring they were insisting that their employers give them what are termed "open contracts" in which the salary is delightfully left to be filled in by the actor himself. Almost without knowing it, the movie people had stumbled upon unbelievable deposits of the precious metal. It seemed to be there for any one who chose to pick it up. Salaries became princely. Actresses you had never heard of were guaranteed twenty thousand a year; and directors were counted failures if they fell below a hundred thousand. And a frenzy of spending seized upon every one. Automobiles, pipe-organs in the house, horses, dogs, jewels, swimming-pools, and vintage champagne! If cigars were not lighted with hundred-dollar bills it was only because in the days of an earlier boom Coal Oil Johnny had already done it.

The "movie" has produced a definite state of mind, and rather an autocratic one, as fits an industry that may be about to take charge of the world. The "artistic temperament" naturally plays its large part, and indeed there is now more of the "artistic temperament" than the world has ever before had to cope with:

The whole question of how acting is to be achieved with a cold and unresponsive camera taking the place of an infatuated public might possibly be here discussed. Of course there is always a certain public—the director, the others of the company, and the few outsiders who by hook or crook always manage to be present—yet it is not an adequate audience. And, besides, the conditions of picture-making necessarily permit only a small bit of drama to be done at a time. That is to say there is no long passionate flow of the story to warm up temperament and sweep the artist emotionally away. For example, suppose they are shooting a great moral-uplift picture to be entitled "The Senses." A beautiful vampire is ready in an evening gown of purple chiffon. Around her middle is bound a small tiger-skin—to indicate that she is not a good woman. In a minute she will be asked to lead astray a fattish, middle-aged fellow who looks like a prosperous broker, but not like a devastator of female hearts. She has nothing to buoy her up, to induce the necessary reprehensible emotion, you may suppose. But when the camera man is ready a small, rather dirty violinist, fully equipped, steals stealthily forward, and almost under the lovely creature's nose draws forth from his instrument the low, thrilling strains which immediately inspire her to have her will of her victim.

Never before have the charms of music to thrill a savage breast, or to bring tears to the largest, loveliest, forget-me-not blue eyes been so thoroughly recognized. The sister art is constantly employed, sometimes even at the cost of perfect harmony, as when, side by side in the studio, a bit of Beethoven is being played by a New England ex-schoolmistriss on a melodeon to stimulate the actors in "Her Fatal Sin" and a jazz tune super-jazzed by a colored quartet so that the hero of a comic may with greater comicality fall into a coal-hole. It is now even said that one director "cutting" a film feels that his temperament makes it essential that he do so to the melody from a string quartet.

Temperament takes strange forms, and among them are the breaking of contracts and an occasional divorce:

Everything is grist that comes to the mill of temperament, if it is no more than having all your meals upstairs on a tray or wearing sables in August. One does one's best, if it is only the little actress who lets her fellow-guests see that her gentlemen friends always call her at least fifteen times to the telephone during dinner in the hotel dining-room—a matter accomplished by arrangement with a bellboy if anything goes wrong. There is one great man who would not consider crossing the continent without his private band which plays after dinner in one of his private cars; he is for the moment quenching the fire within his breast. Chacun à son goût. Another, a famous comedian, prefers to everything the liquid eloquence of his favorite "yes-men" tell him antipathically how great he'd be in "Hamlet," if only the damn play was screenable; and legend, so often apocryphal, even says that an agreeable and accomplished monkey who inhabits Hollywood and may generally be seen whenever a scenario contains a good simian part, is himself not averse to the pleasures of being interviewed by some humble and worshipping writer for a moving-picture paper.

The author devotes a concluding chapter to the American child. Because families have grown smaller he supposes the value of the child has enhanced:

An English visitor in the middle 'eighties notes with grave consternation the difficulty American parents have in keeping children from swearing and from calling their parents by their given names. It would be hard to say today just how general swearing has become among our best children, but in any case we may be sure that if they swear it is considered part of their charm as it is of parrots. As for calling father "Arthur" or "Woopsy," that goes without saying. And old gentlemen who in the early nineteenth century would have belched fire had they been addressed as anything but "Sir" will now fawn upon children, pleading with them to be called "Cousin Howard" or "Scootums." Anything as formal as the old modes of address seems rigid and chilling, and likely to lose to their elders that approbation by children which is now so essential to any self-respect.

Mr. Rhodes seems to think that there may be too much scientific knowledge about children. It must not be allowed to rub off the remaining bloom:

Once upon a time there was a very beautiful little girl with golden locks who lived like a princess with her very modern and scientific father and mother in a large house upon a little hill where many wild strawberries grew. A well-meaning but unscientific grown-up guest (a wretched bachelor, of course) suggested one day, when he happened to be breakfasting alone with the little girl, whom he very much liked, that she and he should spend the morning blissfully gathering the sweet-perfumed little berries which they would eat at lunch with the thick cream which came from the nice cow in the barn. The lovely little girl said, "No, thank you," but her lip trembled. Then the foolish old bachelor again explained and urged his delightful plan, upon which the lovely little girl burst into tears and rushed from the table. The scientific mother a little later explained that by the doctor's orders the lovely little girl had never in all her life been allowed to eat any uncooked fruit!

There have been many books written about American cities. Doubtless there will be many more. Mr. Rhodes has chosen the best of all tones in which to approach his subject, the tone of gentle and kindly badinage.

AMERICAN TOWNS AND PEOPLE. By Harrison Rhodes. New York: Robert M. McBride & Co.

It is no doubt true that nearly all human inventions have been suggested by natural objects. Frémont of the French School of Mines points out an interesting example in the case of the screw, the fundamental idea of which, he believes, was suggested to primitive man by the spiral shape of the edible snail. It was not the shape of the shell that suggested the screw, but the spiral motion which it is necessary to give to the body of the snail in order to withdraw it from the shell. This at once showed that an object of a screw shape embedded in a solid powerfully resisted attempts to withdraw it by a straight pull. The hint was enough, and the screw became one of the earliest of man's inventions.

A "phantom herd" of buffaloes, reported for years by Indians to be grazing in the Mackenzie River Basin in the Canadian Northwest, has at last been discovered by a white man, F. H. Kitto, a Canadian engineer. He estimates the herd at 1000 head and says the Indians of the country report a larger herd farther north.

Ships and cargoes valued at eight billion dollars were sunk during the war. Hundreds of these ships may be salvaged and made fit for service.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending November 27, 1920, were $133,300,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $159,100,000; a decrease of $20,800,000.

A loss of more than $16,000,000 in the gold settlement fund of the Federal Reserve Board was mainly responsible for a decrease in total gold held by the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco of $16,682,000 during the week ending November 26th. Total reserves fell off $20,475,000 principally for the same reason.

The general deflation movement continues, and toward the end seems to find progress accelerated as the financial effects of the decline in prices bear their hardest at times when potential buyers either have not the funds at their disposition or are holding off our workmen do not succeed in bringing vastly increased efficiency as compared with that in the past few years, we will be compelled to reduce wages materially if we are to continue an important factor in world commerce.

It is plain to be seen that slack business is permitting the employing interests to weed out the more inefficient among their employees, and it should not be long before the business of the country is booming along in much smoother fashion than it has for a decade.

Copper and other metals have been under decided pressure of late, and until the excess war supplies are absorbed we may not look for much advance in this market.

Independent steel interests are rapidly working toward the Steel Corporation's schedule of prices, and it seems to me that the trend in steel prices is certainly to a level considerably under the schedule. The big test will likely come next spring.

Farming interests are disposed to sell grains a little more freely, and must continue to do so if the buying power of our agricultural regions is to be felt materially.

We have seen cotton after its very sharp rise to four or five hundred points from the bottom of the year revert to the low prices. There is very little snap on the buying side of the cotton market as yet, though naturally the lower prices go the more dangerous it is for operators on the short side.

A recent compilation has shown that the four previous big bear markets of the last twenty years ranged in length from twelve months and twenty-nine days to fourteen months and twenty-four days and included a down-swing in average prices of from 38 to 45 per cent.

It is generally figured that the present bear market began November 3d last year, and to date there has been a decline in the percentages of something over 36, which all may mean little or nothing except that as a matter of psychology Wall Street is prone to figure on "past performances," and the suggestion is plainly evident that we are very much nearer the low prices on this movement than the high prices which we are likely to see during 1921.

We may see a good many bear attacks on the market from time to time within the next three or four months, as different industries are affected by the credit strain and the necessity to liquidate. At the same time we should not close our eyes to the fact that a great many stocks are selling at ridiculously low prices and among them are a great many that are not only absolutely unaffected by the general tendency toward liquidation of inventories, but, on the other hand, many are positively benefited thereby.

The public utilities, for instance, and all the companies that cater directly to them are in position to profit enormously from the lowering costs of things they buy. This is particularly so in regard to copper costs. So far as the railroads are concerned, their technical position, which was weakened by the too impetuous buying on the part of the public, has been straightened out again and there are bargains all through the railroad list.

In general we may figure that much liquidation is still to come from financial concerns in the interior, and especially in the industrial centers where promotions were going ahead pretty rapidly in various lines and where business mortalities must cause a good deal of derangement, but, on the other hand, lowering prices of securities find an increasing number of strong interests willing to buy, and the market should very soon be in position to respond in a splendid rise to the sort of buying that generally precedes the January reinvestment demand.—The Trader.

The National Bank of Commerce in New York issues the following statement regarding current market conditions:

"The country's credit requirements have, during the period under review, reached a maximum level. Pressure may for a time continue at this current high level, but no substantial increase is anticipated in the demand for banking accommodations, either for crop financing or to meet commercial and industrial requirements. The credit position is essentially sound and the future is to be regarded with confidence.

"The banks and reserve institutions have financed the enormous volume of current requirements with no weakening of their reserve strength. The beginning of a reduction in the aggregate of these requirements is now evident. Loans of reporting member banks of the reserve system expanded steadily until the middle of October. A moderate contraction is now shown. Interior banks in diverse sections of the country are moderately increasing the volume of their purchases of commercial paper, an evidence of the release of funds from other employments. They have also begun, in a small way, to reduce their borrowings with other banks. Such contraction as has occurred is not of large volume. It is important, however, because, in the present difficult situation, it indicates an ability greater than might have been anticipated, on the part of both the interior banks and their customers to liquidate outstanding obligations. It indicates also that the future trend will be toward the contraction rather than expansion of such obligations.

"Open market rates on commercial loans have continued unchanged on an 8 per cent. level, with country banks purchasing paper in fair volume. Call money was tight, ruling throughout most of the period at from 9 to 10 per cent, but easing at the close to 7 per cent. The continuing high rates in the call money market reflected the general stringency of credit rather than the requirements of the stock market, where sharp liquidation continued throughout the period. Both demands for and offerings of time loans on securities were nominal. Moderate offerings of time money may reasonably be expected shortly, as funds are released from other uses. This would result in lower quotations. Prime bank acceptances were in active demand and in reduced supply.

"The determining factor in the entire situation continues to be the reluctance of consumers to buy, partly because of their expectation that prices may go even lower, and in part because of the curtailment of purchasing power of large sections of the buying public. Farmers are not purchasing actively at present because prices of the products which they have to offer in exchange have declined sharply. Wage-earners hesitate to purchase because their earnings are being curtailed by increasing unemployment and in some cases by reduction in wages.

"The adjustment of prices to new conditions of supply and demand has proved difficult. Two factors on the buying side of the equation offer much encouragement, however. In comparison with those classes whose income increased rapidly during the period of rising prices, the decline in prices which has already taken place has increased the purchasing power of salaried employees and persons in receipt of fixed incomes from investments. Large crops assure a fair volume of buying throughout the agricultural parts of the country, especially the grain states. Farmers unquestionably are delaying their purchases until the prices of what they must buy approach the level at which they must sell their crops. As that level is approached they will buy in increasing volume, because their position is essentially sound."

When the Pacific Studios in San Mateo are completed and actual work starts on the first production of the Golden State Motion Picture Corporation there is going to be a flood of motion-picture people coming here. This is the belief of H. H. Van Loan, noted scenario writer and author of "Mickey Flynn," the initial picture of the Golden State Company.

According to Mr. Van Loan, what the producers need is a little encouragement, and when they see that this part of the country really wants them they will come. "Truly, I believe the film people could be lured to any part of the world if the proper inducements were made.

"I expect to see," said Mr. Van Loan, "within the next year a number of prominent cinema projects launched here, both by old and new organizations.

"The Pacific Studios are going to be the finest in the land, and they will attract producers from everywhere. Film men are always looking forward to better pictures, and they will soon discover that with the superior equipment of the new studios they will be able to realize their ambition."

Production on "Mickey Flynn" is to start as soon as the new studios are ready. The rain has delayed work on the project and the plant will not be ready as soon as expected.

Present plans for "Mickey Flynn" call for an elaborate production, to cost in the neighborhood of $100,000. The best directors and actors in the country will be obtained. Already Mr. Van Loan has engaged such noted players as Gaston Glass, Wallace Beery, and Ethel Kaye. At least four months will be spent in making the picture.

To some extent the public's growing reluctance to buy commodities is "a strike of consumers against unconscionable prices," but, in the opinion of the New York Evening Post, the situation may be largely attributed to the sheer exhaustion of the public's purchasing power. This cause of the business slump has not been sufficiently emphasized, we are told. During flush times people actually bought much more than they needed for their immediate necessities, and they are now living on these reserves, which must be used up, at least to a considerable extent, before there can be any revival of buying. In other words, the public is "commodity saturated." As the Evening Post puts it:

"Wage-earners not only bought silk shirts, but bought them by the half-dozen and dozen, and it must have been the same in the entire field of dress. To millions with a very moderate income there had been preached for years a counsel of perfection: that it is more economical to buy high-class goods than shoddy, and more economical to buy two or three suits of clothes and get long wear by frequent change than to buy one suit and consume it rapidly. It was the same counsel of perfection, or the same regret, so often expressed in connection with the tenement poor, who pay more for their coal and ice than the millionaire does because they have no storage facilities. The war for the first time made it possible for a great many people to buy in quantity.

"Are people as shabby as they are reputed to be, in protest against high prices? Are shoes and clothes marooned on the merchants' shelves because people are resoling their old shoes and wearing old overcoats, or because they are wearing new shoes and clothes purchased on a generous scale in times of prosperity? One reason for the present partial paralysis of commodity markets may be that the public is commodity saturated."

An obvious corollary to the proposition thus stated by the Evening Post is that once people have worn out their present stock of shoes and clothes and furniture, they must start buying again. And the date can not be so very many months ahead.

Whatever injustices or impositions the public may have suffered in the past by reason of the one-sided bargains driven by the utility corporations and the high-handed methods by which some of them enforced their contracts and squeezed out of them every possible cent of profit, no one will deny that the more recent situation has represented too great a reaction from the old order, and many of the corporations have come upon conditions where they were unable to make a decent living.

Happily another change is now in progress—a reaction from the reaction; and sensible officials and communities are recognizing the fact that these public service concerns must be allowed to get something out of their activities—if not to the extent of assured profits, at least to the extent that will save them from insolvency and at the same time enable them to keep the service efficient. It is an economic axiom that "when a business stops growing it begins to die," just as it is said of man that when he ceases to progress his retrogression is under way.

So if the public utilities of any community are not keeping up with the needs of that community, and are therefore hindering its development and convenience, everybody should be at once interested in ascertaining the cause of the delinquency and assisting in its cure. Out of this new conception of service and co-operation has grown the idea of partnership between the public and the utilities companies, the sense of give and take—a principle that is gaining ground all the time and that is consequently improving the outlook for all concerned.—Salt Lake City Deseret News.

The acquiring of the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad by the Western Pacific Railroad emphasizes the force of a guarantee as applied to corporate securities. The Denver and Rio Grande, at the time of the construction of the Western Pacific, guaranteed by endorsement on each bond to pay the interest on the $50,000,000 Western Pacific first mortgage 5 per cent. bond issue in the event the interest was not fully earned by the Western Pacific. What happened is now history, and incidentally law, but the court ruling to force the guarantee has greatly improved the position of guaranteed bonds.

It was the custom in earlier days, when a strong railroad wished to absorb another property, to guarantee the payment of the principal and interest on the outstanding funded debt of the purchased lines. This was usually accomplished by stamping on each bond a clause setting forth the unconditional guarantee of principal and interest.

Some of these old issues of bonds, not so generally known in the far West, occasionally come into the market for sale. There are some Southern Pacific issues of this type which are now available to yield more than 7 per cent. over a long period of years. Discriminating investors are buying these bonds, according to a report made by Martin Judge, Jr., American National Bank Building, San Francisco.

and offer $50,000 City of Los Banos, California, 5½ per cent. water bonds, tax exempt in California and exempt from all Federal income taxes.

The City of Los Banos, with an estimated population of 1500, is situated in the western part of Merced County on the Southern Pacific Railroad. The surrounding country is an irrigated farming section devoted to general farming, stock raising, and dairying. It is the principal city on the west side of the San Joaquin Valley and has a very large country tributary. Los Banos is an old, substantial, and well-built city. It contains three banks with over $1,500,000 deposits, several creameries, a condensed milk factory, two cheese factories, warehouses, good schools, etc.

These bonds are issued for the purpose of acquiring the present water-works system and improving, enlarging, and extending it to meet the needs of the city.

The Blankenbom-Hunter-Dulin Company announce that the $200,000 issue of Tuhs Island Company first mortgage 7 per cent. serial bonds recently offered by them has been certified by the state superintendent of banks as legal investment for savings banks and trust funds in California.

A syndicate composed of E. H. Rollins & Sons, E. F. Hutton & Co., Spencer Trask & Co., and Paul A. Schoellkopf are offering $4,000,000 Niagara Falls power first consolidated mortgage Series AA 6s, 1950, at 87½ and interest, to yield 7 per cent.

The Niagara Falls Power Company owns and operates all the hydro-electric power plants on the American side of the Niagara River at Niagara Falls and controls the power plant on the Canadian side of the Falls owned and operated by the Canadian Niagara Power Company. The present aggregate installed generating capacity of the four generating stations on the American side of the Falls is approximately 373,500 horsepower, and the additional 112,500 horsepower installed in the generating stations of the Canadian Niagara Power Company brings the aggregate of the system plants up to 486,000 horsepower. Plans have been perfected for an ultimate combined capacity of about 620,000 horsepower.

The Series AA Bonds are to be issued under an indenture to be executed as a supplement to the first and consolidation mortgage, which covers all the tangible and physical properties, plants, transmission systems, improvements, water and other rights, franchises, etc., now owned by the company for the development and transmission of power, and all property hereafter acquired by it through the proceeds of the first and consolidation mortgage bonds, as well as all bonds and shares of capital stock (except qualifying shares of directors) of the Canadian Niagara Power Company now owned or hereafter acquired, subject to existing liens on a part thereof. The first and consolidation mortgage bonds are secured by a direct first mortgage upon real estate, electrical machinery, and a transmission and distributing system of large value and constituting an important part of the company's properties.

The real estate interests, power houses, transmission systems, etc., owned by the Niagara Falls Power Company and the Canadian Niagara Power Company and the investments pledged with trustees under various mortgages are carried on the consolidated balance sheet under date of September 30, 1920, at $53,999,366.77, or $23,733,366.77 in excess of the total funded debt of the two companies outstanding in the hands of the public, including the $4,000,000 of the Niagara Falls Power Company first and consolidation mortgage Series AA 6 per cent. gold bonds to be presently outstanding. The equity in these properties beyond the total funded debt outstanding in the hands of the public, as represented by the present market values of the preferred and common stocks, is easily over $23,000,000.

The proceeds from the sale of the $4,000,000 first and consolidation mortgage Series AA 6 per cent. gold bonds will be used to reimburse the company's treasury for part of the expenditures involved in installing three new generating units, each with a rated output capacity of about 37,500 horsepower, building a new central control station, connecting the various plants on the American side of the Falls with high-tension lines, dredging and deepening the hydraulic canal, building additional penstocks and installing other equipment for the efficient distribution of the additional power.

An earnest effort is being made by the Good Railway Service Association of California and other public-spirited bodies to aid the railroads in a campaign to relocate freight cars on the lines of their owners in order to provide proper opportunity for renewals and repairs and thus improve the quality of the equipment offered to shippers. To this end car service rules requiring the shipper to load cars to or in the direction of the owning road will be rigidly enforced.

Mr. John S. Dym, chairman for Northern California of the Good Railway Service Association, which is comprised of more than 600 public-spirited men, explains the situation as follows:

"During the Federal administration of the railroads the freight-car equipment was practically pooled and interchanged indiscriminately regardless of ownership, which naturally resulted in cars being widely scattered. Some Pacific Coast railroads have not seen their own equipment for three years, and naturally this equipment while in the hands of other roads was given only running repairs.

"Since the return of the railroads to their owners a consistent effort is being made, under mutual agreement of all roads, as established by car service rules, to relocate freight cars on their home lines. At present, therefore, shippers are required to confine the use of cars of the railroads on which the shipment originates to shipments for local points on the line and to use foreign road cars into foreign territory. If shippers generally will cooperate in the matter it will redound to their benefit by improving the car supply and the quality of equipment provided.

"Shippers in placing orders for cars should show destination and routing in order to give the railroad the proper opportunity to furnish a suitable car for off-line shipments. In the event that this is not done and the car is loaded without the permission of the railroad on which the shipment originates, it would make it necessary to transfer the freight—so it is to the advantage of shippers to avoid danger of expense and delay by cooperating with the railroads to the end that every one may be better served."

The growth in world debts and paper currency has not been checked by the return to peace. The additions to world national debts, which averaged $40,000,000 per annum during the war, were $44,000,000,000 in the year just ended—the second peace year. The additions to world paper currency, which averaged $9,000,000,000 per annum during the year, were $12,000,000,000 in the first peace year and $25,000,000,000 in the year just ended.

A detailed discussion of world national debts and paper currency, appearing in the November issue of the Americas, issued by the National City Bank of New York, prepared by the bank's statistician, Mr. O. P. Austin, shows that world national debts, which increased from $43,000,000,000 in 1913 to $212,000,000,000 at the date of the armistice, were $256,000,000,000 one year later and $300,000,000,000 in November, 1920, two years after the armistice. World paper currency, which increased from $7,500,000,000 in 1913 to $43,000,000,000 at the date of the armistice, was $55,000,000,000 one year later and $82,000,000,000 in November, 1920, the end of the second peace year. The ratio of gold to world paper currency, which averaged 66.3 per cent. in 1913 and 17.6 per cent. at the close of the war, was 13.5 per cent. at the end of the first peace year and 9.2 per cent. on the second anniversary of the armistice. Annual interest charges on world national debts, which were about $1,750,000,000 per annum prior to the war, were approximately $9,000,000,000 per annum at its close, and now more than $12,000,000,000 per annum. These figures are in all cases based upon the pre-war par value of the currencies of the respective countries, but are in all cases exclusive of currency or other obligations of the Soviet government of Russia.

Most of the after-the-war increase in national debts and paper currency occurs in Europe. National debts in North and South America show an actual decline in the second peace year and but a trifling increase in Asia, Africa, and Oceania, while national debts in Europe increased $30,000,000,000 in the first year following the armistice and $45,000,000,000 in the second year, just ended. Paper currency, which increased about $2,000,000,000 in North and South America in the second year and showed a slight reduction in Asia, Africa, and Oceania, increased $11,000,000,000 in Europe in the first year following the armistice, and $26,000,000,000 in the year just ended. Europe's share of the world national debt is 86 per cent. and of world paper currency 88 per cent.

These post-war increases in national debts and paper currency are, says the writer, largely a result of "budget deficits," especially in the European countries, and were the subject of much attention and sharp criticism at the recent Brussels financial conference of the league of nations. The operations of governmental machinery, paid for in a greatly depreciated currency, are necessarily many times in cost those of the pre-war period, while the mere interest charges on national debts are now more than a billion dollars a month, and with these conditions national expenditures have run far in excess of receipts from taxation and can only be met by increases in national debts or new issues of paper currency. Reports submitted at the Brussels financial conference indicated that three-fourths of the governments of the world are now showing annual budget deficits and that eleven of the twelve European countries, reporting there

An Exiled Empress.

The author, Miss Agnes Carey, spent a year with the Empress Eugénie at Farnborough, England. The empress seems to have been very communicative, making frequent references to her life and describing incidents and adventures that had never been published. Miss Carey, on her part, faithfully transcribed everything that she heard, usually the same night, and as she seems to have done this with conscientious care her book may almost be regarded as the story of the empress herself. We can easily forgive the inclusion of a few trivialities and irrelevances, the result of literary inexperience.

Among the incidents described by the empress are the escape from Paris and a secret visit to the emperor while he was a prisoner of war in Germany. Dr. Carey, who piloted the empress out of Paris, told her that she had once saved his life at Constantinople and he was happy to return the service. Speaking of the mob that surrounded the Tuileries, the empress said: "Nothing in nature, neither storms nor the angry elements, can give one the faintest idea of a people in violent anger. Without experiencing it, no one can imagine what it means to have a whole people howling against you—it is horrible."

Marie Claire's Workshop.

The appearance many years ago of "Marie Claire" was deservedly hailed as a work of art. It was the story of a young French girl, told with absolute fidelity and with all the detail and delicacy of a cameo. Now we have a sequel to "Marie Claire," describing her life in Mme. Dalignac's workshop, the girls who worked with her, their privations, fears, hopes, and love affairs. Mme. Dalignac was "a saint on earth," but, like most other saints, impractical, unbusinesslike, timid, and confiding. The workshop was a failure and we leave Marie Claire at the dawn of a still greater adventure that looks by no means promising. Marguerite Audoux knows better than any other French writer how to reproduce a phase of life as a complete reality, and because of this she can afford to dispense with some of the recognized mechanism of the novelist.

MARIE CLAIRE'S WORKSHOP. By Marguerite Audoux. New York: Thomas Seltzer.

Camouflage.

Mr. Solomon J. Solomon, R. A., seems to think that we are still far from appreciating the extent and the skill of the German camouflage system. He says that evidence of the German methods was laid before the authorities early in March, 1918, but it was officially repudiated until the end of the war. As a matter of fact the Germans covered large areas of the country with huge structures designed to represent agricultural land and the normal incidents of the landscape, and these had been prepared far in advance of the war and with skilled attention to the manipulation of shadows and to all other details that might serve their end.

The author now presents to us the whole art of camouflage based in the main upon a study of German achievements. He shows how the whole appearance of a countryside may be radically changed, how roads are hidden and false roads constructed, and how the most formidable of military works are disguised as tilled fields. Perhaps only the expert can appreciate this work at its full value, but certainly it is not one to be overlooked by those concerned with what must be called a war weapon of the highest value. Mr. Solomon not only explains his ideas in the most lucid language, but he reinforces them with numerous admirable illustrations, many of them tinted and showing what was actually done during the war.

STRATEGIC CAMOUFLAGE. By Solomon J. Solomon, R. A. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $9.

Four Blind Mice

"Four Blind Mice," a novel by Cecil Champain Lewis, has the virtue of an unusual plot, handled adroitly enough to sustain interest. It has another virtue in that the author has not sentimentalized over his characters, as do so many other admirable writers who insist on dividing the sheep from the goats in their factitious universes.

With so excellent a beginning for a story with psychological and detective interest it is a pity that the style is weak and hackneyed, and that the four character who give the story its singular inept title are sketchy in outline and weak in coloring. The character drawing is not inaccurate—it is simply unsure, as if done by a hand not yet confident of its power.

The best passages of the book are in the opening chapter, where an illusion is successfully created of the oppressive heat, the sultry showers, and the mosquito-laden atmosphere of Rangoon. However, as the book progresses (and it rapidly does so) the reader must regret the frequency of the hackneyed, rather kiddish, expressions and the vagueness of the principal characters—a vagueness largely due to a lack of conversation on their part. They are almost as silent as they are blind.—R. G.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

The George H. Doran Company has just published "Margot Asquith: An Autobiography," a piquant hook of reminiscences, the publication of which has caused a profound sensation in England.

Before leaving on his lecture tour, during which he will speak in most of the principal cities of the country, W. L. George had a conference with Brock Pemberton concerning his preparation of a play to be produced by Mr. Pemberton.

There was no dissenting voice raised when Mark Twain was proposed for the Hall of Fame. But one ballot was required to elect the creator of Huck Finn to the company of America's immortals. Under the rules which govern election to the American Pantheon a name may not be proposed until ten years have elapsed since the death of its bearer. The nominating committee lost no time in this instance, for it is just ten years since Mark Twain went to join his fathers.

Mr. Jesse W. Weik, who was the literary associate of William H. Herndon, Lincoln's law partner, in the writing of Herndon's "Life of Lincoln," read the advance sheets of "The Paternity of Abraham Lincoln," by William E. Barton, published by Doran.

During its existence of more than a century the British and Foreign Bible Society has distributed approximately 25,000,000 copies of the Bible printed in more than 400 languages and dialects.

LEONARD MERRICK

☞ I have read with keen interest every one of his novels that you have published thus far.

☞ They are all works of distinction, of high literary art.

☞ The best thing about them is that every one of them is a good story well told.

☞ They are so well wrought, the plot basis is so admirable, that, apart from one's constant interest in the story, it is a pleasure to see such workmanship. I quite understand why Barrie calls him the novelist's novelist.

☞ Some of his short stories resemble O. Henry in the element of surprise and concision.

Little History of the War.

Out of the endless multitude of little histories of the late war one has come from France that will probably outlive all the rest. It is brief, compact, graphic, and satisfying. The author is H. Vast, "honorary examiner for admission at L'Ecole de St. Cyr." The translator is Dr. Raymond Weeks of Columbia University. The title is "Little History of the Great War." The feature of this work that renders it so worth while is its comprehensiveness. It not only tells the story of the struggle itself, but it goes back into the causes leading up to the conflict and leaves the reader with a full and intelligent appreciation of the whys and wherefores. In addition the volume contains twenty-seven maps representing practically every important phase of the geography of the contest. These include, besides maps of the battlefields, such subjects as the Middle Europe Scheme, Peninsula of the Balkans, Alsace, Saloniki and Gallipoli, Armenia, Pre-War Colonial Africa, Former Russian Empire, Trentino and Carso, Bagdad, Syria and Palestine. The style throughout, as is to be expected in a French work, is clear, luminous, and entertaining.

Legal Decisions on State Rights.

Students of law and history interested in the conflicts between the state and Federal governments in the United States have been provided with a valuable publication by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. It is an analysis, prepared under the direction of James Brown Scott, of the decisions of the Supreme Court on various issues involving relative state and Federal rights and jurisdiction. The volume contains upwards of 500 pages and covers some eighty historical decisions, dating from 1799 to 1918.

JUDICIAL SETTLEMENT OF CONTROVERSIES BETWEEN STATES AND THE AMERICAN UNION. Edited by James Brown Scott. London, England: Clarendon Press.

The Fire of London.

"For two and a half centuries the Great Fire of London has awaited an historian." This sentence heads the preface to a book just published by the John Lane Company of New York and London, entitled "The Great Fire of London in 1666." The work is by Walter George Bell, F. R. A. S. San Franciscans in particular will find pleasure in Mr. Bell's book, and will be surprised, probably, at the rather close parallel between the experiences of that remote period and of San Francisco's holocaust in 1906. Evidently great fires are all more or less alike; also they all seem equally unable to put an end to the cities which they devastate. Mr. Bell's tale of London, the fire, and the reconstruction of the city afterward confirms this conclusion.

THE GREAT FIRE OF LONDON. By Walter George Bell. New York: John Lane Company.

Briefer Reviews.

"Blueberry Bear," by J. L. Sherard, published by the Thomas Y. Crowell Company, and with illustrations in color, is a good bear story for good little children.

"Song Devices and Jingles," by Eleanor Smith (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company; $1.50), is designed especially to help the large numbers of little children apparently without musical gifts—the so-called "monotones" and the musically dependent.

G. P. Putnam's Sons have published "Peggy Stewart, Navy Girl: At Home," by Gabrielle E. Jackson. This is the first of three volumes—all under the general title of "Peggy Stewart, Navy Girl"—in which the various experiences and adventures of the little heroine will be followed.

"The Light of the World," a three-act drama by Guy Bolton and George Middleton, has been published by Henry Holt & Co. The characters are the peasants who took part in the Passion Play at Oberammergau, the hero being Anton, the carpenter. This play was produced at the Lyric and Manhattan Theatres, New York City.

To be unable to catch fish after reading "Goin' Fishin'" by Dixie Carroll, is sure proof of a hoodoo. For here is every needed information and tip about weather, bait, tackle, strategy, and outfit, and all written so delightfully that to read the book goes far to compensate for the lack of a vacation. The publisher is the Stewart & Kid Company, Cincinnati. Price, $3.

"Being and Becoming," by Fenwicke Lindsay Holmes (Robert M. McBride & Co.), is described as "a book of lessons in the science of mind." Turning the pages at random, we find the following gem: "Again, suppose there is a house to be sold. You may say to Universal Mind: 'I now turn over this house to you, for I have no further use for it. Give me its equivalent in what I can now use.' Then specify what you wish and expect it to come. Spirit then has a channel to manifest a sale for you."

THE ENEMIES OF WOMEN

Is there anything stronger than the appeal a woman has for a man?

Blasco Ibanez finds the self-sufficiency of the male routed all along the line. In his Alicia he has concentrated all the restless fascination of the female of the species as she was found in the old Europe of the pre-war days. But how the lure of sex may in great crises become a regenerator of character is shown in this new volume which does for the war's ideals what "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" did for the war as a conflict of material forces.

"CHU CHIN CHOW."

Those who revel in gorgeous spectacle may congratulate themselves that "Chu Chin Chow," now in its fifth year at London, has been sent out to San Francisco. Personally I prefer, always, always, always, real plays about real people. But "Chu Chin Chow," which is a musical extravaganza, has many artistic claims to the imagination. The costumes and settings, which are opulent and beautiful in the extreme, are designed by London artists; the music, which is by Frederick Norton, is dramatic, colorful, and saturated with the atmosphere of the Orient.

The dances and floating draperies, the rich, harmonious colors, the patterned and carefully designed stage pictures are feasts for the eye. There are several sweet-voiced singers in the cast, and the love lyrics were very sweetly sung by Roy Cropper, a young man with a pleasing tenor, a fine athletic body, but only a limited amount of temperament.

Eugene Cowles, who will be forever associated in the memories of San Franciscans with "Robin Hood," was the invaluable dispenser of organ-like tones which filled the air with vocal rhythm while the magnificently clad slaves of Kasim Baba marched in and out with fanciful paces and contributed to the beauty of the splendid spectacle. I am still wondering why the miser, Kasim Baba—billed as the richest and meanest man in Bagdad—did himself so extremely well in the matter of splendor of appointment in his palace and his slaves. However, we wondered during a whole act about various things, having overlooked a printed summary of the play on the programme. For if you value your piece of mind, you who read and intend to go, do not neglect to read that synopsis, for the players put on—intentionally—a sort of old-time exaggeration of vocal delivery which is hard to understand. I don't believe—having been rather far back; in the "R" row, to be explicit—that I understood three consecutive words of Elsie Malstad, "the singing slave girl," who is young, sweet-voiced, and pretty, but who twitters her dialogue indistinctly.

Thorai Lake was very good as Chu Chin Chow. Tall, imposing, rather dead in manner during Chu Chin Chow's moments of fearful menace, he served well as a figure to affect the imagination. Marjorie Wood, "the desert woman," without real beauty of face or figure, possesses dramatic impressiveness. Besides, her features lent themselves to the suggestion of an Asiatic woman of alien race, her movements were wild and free, and her speaking voice full, strong, and musical.

Adelaide Mesmer as the head wife of the wealthy miser had good vocal delivery, and her features possessed decorative and dramatic value.

Albert Howson as the miser had to employ the distressing speech of a senile old wheezer who afflicted us during the miser's moments of loquacity. Fortunately he was obliged to remain silent the greater part of the time, although the actor came out strong when the terrible brigand threatened the life of the Kasim Baba, who bounded around the stage with the convulsive movements of a beheaded fowl as he begged for mercy.

Don W. Ferrandou established a rapport with his sympathetic audience because of the abandon of Ali Baba's alcoholic smiles and wine-exhilarated dances.

These are the most prominent ones in the cast, but there are others, only the list is too long to further particularize. There was a singer, though, Edgar Kiefer by name, who charmed the audience by a long and lovely lay he sang; a song full of Oriental enchantment. And there were pantomimists, and an impressive fortune-teller, and negroids, who are always picturesque adjuncts in Oriental spectacles. The music wove strange enchantments, for it is well in harmony with the totality of this immense spectacular extravaganza, which is an adapted stage version of the story of "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves."

I can imagine with players of the very best—for although these were good as usual—and I reiterate, I do not blame, for business is business, and we are far away—but as usual they have not given us first best. We kept approaching moments of poetic illusion, there was music and poetry and beauty in the air, and yet they never quite yielded us the Great Illusion. The imagination was not made wholly captive. Now why was that, with all this lavishness of music, spectacle, and drama? Simply because our imagination is affected through the imaginations of others. These people, carefully selected though they are, are not first-class artists, and therefore have not first-class imaginations. We approximated reaching the Great Illusion. And probably less sophisticated theatre-goers reached it; but I should say that the old stagers just sailed in and enjoyed a rarely magnificent spectacle as spectacle. We are not wont to see anything of this kind again in a hurry, and it was a big venture to come so far away. If you have the loose cash in your jeans go, by all means. You won't find much to laugh at, the comedy element having been rather neglected; but from this truthful account you may perceive that the management gives generously even for the big money that is charged.

They are, as is the custom, telling a huge whopper when they claim that there are 300 on the stage. But there are as many as we want; enough to fill the stage, and almost crowd it, for that matter. And I don't believe that we have ever seen anything more magnificent than the opening scene—that in which Chu Chin Chow and his suite are received as the guests of Kasim Baba—with its color and glow, its golden background, its panoramic figures, and the superbly designed architectural proportions and effects of the scene. There is, too, a fine Chinese cast to the figures and costumes of Chu Chin Chow and his suite, and it is very evident that they are designed after Chinese models.

"FANNY'S FIRST PLAY."

There was quite a to do over "Fanny's First Play" when it first came out—1910 in England, 1914 in New York—due to the originality of the scheme—i. e., presenting Fanny, Fanny's Victorian papa, and the dramatic critics in a prologue, and again in an epilogue, after the performance of Fanny's play, when the critics show a plentiful lack of initiative in giving their opinions. Shaw, of course, got it in on the critics, each of whom, naturally, represented one of the real London article. This, possibly, was of more interest to the critics than to the general public; at any rate they wrote considerably about the play, not in the spirit of warfare, however, as Shaw, in satirizing them, did it without malice.

"Fanny's First Play," in its entirety, is one of the most popularly witty of Shaw's comedies. Impartially Shaw gives good-natured slaps at men and women, at wives and husbands, at French and English. In accordance with his invariable habit he presents a deeply thought-out criticism of the human species which is, to the unthinking, farce pure and simple, because the popular conception of the human species is so very different from Shaw's. Shaw always looks under the skin of the human animal, and sees him as he is. The human animal, however, views the species through a sentimental haze. These two irreconcilable points of view assist the great satirist in his sardonically conceived task of holding up human nature to exhibit its folly by laughing, as at a series of delightful absurdities, at what is really founded strictly on truth.

Thus Margaret Knox, when the policeman laid hands on her, in swift, atavistic abandonment to primitive rage promptly knocked out two of his teeth, and with some surprise, but without shame, she heard issuing from her lips a flood of abuse couched in words that she had not known hitherto existed in her inner consciousness.

As to her father, whose respectability is deeply shocked by learning of his daughter's arrest, in his perturbation he voices his real feelings by saying, "I don't care what happened if only people don't find it out."

This is the whole idea of the play; the revelation by unconscious human nature of itself, the whole lighted up by Shaw's flow of wit and humor, so that the audience is kept in a state of continual laughter. He satirizes, in Savoyard, the self-satisfied ignorant but business-like theatre manager; the complacent parents who believe that their ponderous society and that of their contemporaries can satisfy the social yearnings of the younger generation as embodied in their children. He makes fun of the sturdy, unashamed British snobbery which is exhibited in rank profusion on the discovery that the Gilberts' footman is the impecunious son of a duke. He shows up the stodginess of British conventionalities by placing them in contrast to the one bit of nature in the group; which gayly dares to flourish in the joyous personality of Miss Delaney, who is outside the pale and therefore dares to be herself. He shows us the wretched Mr. Knox, his entire being outraged by his daughter's unconventional outbreak, finding his only comfort in life in the society of his equally shocked wife, because they share the guilty secret; only to discover later, however, that his wife has passed her marital lifetime in a state of inward criticism and revolt.

Fanny, the writer of the play, is neatly dressed down for her twentieth-century precocity by the great Trotter; presumably he represents William Archer. (Flawner Bannal, of course, must be that essence of mid-Victorianism, Clement Scott.) In return, this young representative of modern, youthful independence and irreverence tells the great critic how her fellow-students at Cambridge patronize and make game of him because his views are irreconcilable with their modernness.

Nobody, indeed, in the play is spared except the Frenchman and Juggins, the ducal footman, who maintains his dignity and his prestige unimpaired throughout the play; probably because Shaw respected his creation, since he, the son of a duke, dared to repair his impecuniosity by doing the one thing he felt he could do.

The Frenchman is, of course, Shaw. That is he becomes Shaw when he launches a long oration in which he compares the French and English, to the credit of the English, whom he conceives as being represented by his young revolvers. This is Shaw at his most

Lombard Street Reservoir

"The reservoir, located upon one of the most commanding positions in the city, occupies an entire hundred-acre lot on Hyde Street, between Greenwich and Lombard. It is constructed of the best materials and in every way reliably built."—Alta California, Feb. 28, 1861.

Lombard Street Reservoir was built in 1860 and has been a necessary unit of the city's distributing system ever since.

It is on the summit of Russian Hill at an elevation of 303 feet.

It receives water from Lake Honda and supplies the high district around Telegraph Hill. Its capacity is 2½ million gallons.

In the '60s Lombard and Francisco Reservoirs were the principal distributing reservoirs in San Francisco, but many years ago, owing to the rapid growth of the city and the water system, they lost their prominence, though not their necessity or usefulness.

They are auxiliary reservoirs used in the solution of certain altitude and pressure problems peculiar to their particular neighborhoods.

The water which passes through them is a very small part of our daily supply."

tedious, for the great polemic always sticks to his point that the playwright has the right to suspend the logical, onward movement of the play in order to give way to a discussion or an exposition.

Shaw, who declares that he who believes in art for art's sake is "a fool, a hopeless fool, and in a state of damnation," can do this, and hold the spectators to the theme because of his brilliant wit and unflinching humor.

But he interferes pretty thoroughly with the merit of the comedy, and "Fanny's First Play," which is a very pronounced example of Shaw's later and more modern abandonment to his theories in this respect, can not stand comparison with some of his earlier works, in spite of the hilarious response which audiences give to its perpetual appeals to our sense of humor.

Mr. Maitland and his company made us properly acquainted with the play because of particularly conscientious work and an enlargement of the company which allowed for suitable presentation of the characters.

The play begins with a long conversation between the eminently practical theatre manager, an embodiment of prose, and Count O'Dowda, a sort of poetic Victorian survival, who lives in Venice and keeps his ears stuffed with cotton wool in order to keep out the shockingly vulgar accents of modern English life. Mr. Lee Willard's stately unctuousness and his rotund distinctness made him suitable to the rôle, and Mr. Maitland was quick to take his cue in the matter of contrast.

Miss Audra Due's rather throaty utterance for some reason toned in with the character of the advanced Fanny. The emancipated Shaw, having just disposed of one excessively long conversation à deux, immediately follows it up by another in which we learn of the impassable gulf that yawns between the two generations, incarnated by Trotter the critic and Fanny the playwright. These over-long conversations, the lengthy discussion between the Knoxes and the Gilbeys, and the prolonged monologue by Du Vallet—who is merely a mouthpiece for Shaw—constitute some of the pronounced faults of the piece. But its witty satire, which audiences receive in the spirit of farce, makes it go.

Also all audiences will take kindly to the coster-girl "daughter of joy," who stands as a symbol of social emancipation. This character, which gives a rôle full of fat to the player of it, was acted with so successful an assumption of Dora Darling's jocund view of life that Mary Morris, who maintained the mood successfully during the whole of the progress of a rather lengthy play, found that she had made something of a hit; in fact, quite a sizable one.

Mr. J. Anthony Smythe looked foreign, if his tongue did not seem particularly so, as the Frenchman, and he was suitably imposing as the elderly critic; and the remaining members of the long cast were conscientious contributors to the merit of the general performance.

A WALL STREET PLAY.

For this week—and next, also, it seems—the Alcazar has secured a special privilege, "Crooked Gamblers" not yet having been released for presentation at any other theatre outside New York. It is a play which shows up the crooked methods by which the inside speculators on Wall Street play fast and loose with the money of investors by undue inflation of stock values.

I will not attempt to recite the devious methods followed by Turner, the plucky Wall Street schemer and gambler of the play. I know I should fall down in the effort, yet, nevertheless, they made the tortuous financiering followed fairly plain.

The play, which is by Samuel Shipman and Percival Wilde, is an effort to let the public inside the hack door, so that they may view the doubtful methods of the Wall Street skinner on the hunt for easy millions. Out of this idea the collaborating pair have evolved a play with plenty of snap, quite a plot, and containing a big scene in which is shown the great culminating fight between a bull and a bear. Up to that time the piece was a sentimental comedy with a strong business flavor. Now it became realistic melodrama. Excitement was in the air. Two officers were seen, one above the other, the action rapidly shifting from the upper to the lower and back again, as the lights rose and fell and window brokers rapidly signaled, while the bull and the bear yelled at each other in the rage of conflict.

The piece does not pretend to literary merit, and the humor is commonplace. But the dialogue is concise, the action well sustained, and the culminating scene quite exciting. One can easily imagine a New York audience hanging with tense interest upon such scenes, that aim at reflecting the financial experiences of many New York citizens. No doubt the play there "went big." Here, however, the audience retained its serenity, although looking on at the staged financial exploits of the Wall Street competitors with considerable interest.

What would be apt to occur to a San Franciscan, however, in seeing a play of this subject and its reception by a San Francisco audience, is the realization that San Franciscans are no longer plungers in the speculative mart. The audience regarded with amused curiosity the antics of the skinner and the skinned, but they had an impersonal air, as of those looking on at something that was not a reflection of their own experiences.

San Francisco has "done time" at this sort of thing during the great days of the Comstock. The old guard has its memories of the big days when stocks were shooting skyward and thousands were rapidly changing hands. But somehow the city eventually became vaccinated against wildcat speculation, and this sort of thing that we see in "Crooked Gamblers" plays a very, very small part in our business world. Odd, when you come to think of it, because ours is just the community, with all the mixed foreign strains in the communal veins, to enter into this kind of speculation with a joyous whoop.

It took eighteen people to represent the characters of the piece, which has very superficial characterization, but plenty of bustle and action. The company handled the play very satisfactorily, Dudley Ayres having the fat rôle of the hulk who tasted first ruin and then victory, while Ben Erway, Elwyn Harvey, Rafael Brunetto, and Charles Yule were other principals on hand to help on the excitement at the crucial moments.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

"Listen Lester" has already established itself at the Columbia Theatre as one of the most successful musical comedies of several seasons. It is now on its second and last week, thoroughly delighting capacity audiences at every performance. Fred Heider is the featured member and is ably assisted by June Roberts, Delano Dell, Betty Kirkbride, René Brown, Francis Donegan, Earl Higley, Claire Grenville, and the Four Entertainers. Matinées will be given Wednesday and Saturday and the engagement will terminate with the performance on Sunday night, December 12th.

Kolb and Dill come to the Columbia on Monday, the 13th, with their new production of "The High Cost of Loving."

The Curran Theatre.

At the Curran Theatre on Monday, F. Ray Comstock and Morris Gest will offer their extravaganza, "Chu Chin Chow," an animated fable of Bagdad, with its mighty cast and ensemble of three hundred and the fourteen bewildering scenes of Oriental splendor, for a second and last week.

"Chu Chin Chow," originally produced at His Majesty's Theatre, London, by Oscar Asche on August 31, 1916, is still playing to capacity houses, and the American production to be seen here is an exact duplicate of the famous London equipment. The Comstock-Gest offering has just completed another phenomenal run at the Century Theatre, New York.

The same cast as appeared at the Century Theatre in New York, headed by Marjorie Wood, Henry Latimer, Eugene Cowles, Roy Cropper, Don W. Ferrandou, Alfred Howson, Elsie Malstad, Adelaide Mesmer, Hattie Carmontel, Gladys Earlsot, Edgar Kiefer, and a ballet of sixty.

Owing to the great length of the performance the management requests that all spectators be in their seats at 8 o'clock. The usual matinées will be given on Wednesday and Saturday.

The Alcazar Theatre.

"Crooked Gamblers" is such a tremendous hit and exerts such wide popular appeal that its continuance at the Alcazar next week is demanded. "Watch My Smoke," a new comedy of love and business has first production at the Sunday matinée, December 12th. It is by Walter A. Rivers of San Francisco and has already been accepted for early New York presentation. "Watch My Smoke" tells a story of deep human appeal, but treats it in a comedy vein. The plot concerns a "wage slave" who feels that all he needs is a little "nest egg" to be able to tell his employer a few things about his business and to demonstrate his latent capabilities. He gets the "nest egg," which has the effect of practically making a new man of him, and the results that he accomplishes give rise to many funny situations. A pretty love theme is threaded through the story. Dudley Ayres will have an exceedingly well-suited rôle, and Elwyn Harvey should score a personal triumph. The other members of the cast should likewise find ample opportunity for their individual talents.

An early offering of comedy and romance is "The Things That Count," in which Alice Brady scored so brilliantly for many months at her father's Playhouse. It is another of the many Alcazar offerings new to the Pacific Coast.

The Orpheum.

Grand opera lovers will have an opportunity of hearing a composite of their favorite arias at the Orpheum next week in Mme. Doree's Operalogue. The selections will include choice portions of "Tales of Hoffman," "Pagliacci," "La Traviata," "Carmen," "Faust," and others. Mme. Doree's Operalogue is described as presenting the most famous of the "Operatic Sweethearts" in some of their most beautiful and inspirational flashes.

"The Magic Glasses," an allegory giving a glimpse of yesterday, today, and tomorrow, is a playlet which is sure to appeal to the imagination. Marie Nordstrom is the author and she has succeeded in making her sketch a sort of amusement melting pot. A doctor has invented "The Magic Glasses," and the wearer of them can see into the future. A young girl unable to decide between two suitors, dons the glasses and sees her life first with one and then with the other.

Laurel Lee will contribute a few scintillating moments to the coming bill. She is spoken of as a girl who is truly different, not alone in the style of her professional routine, but in the way she entertains.

Bigelow and Clinton will make merry for local vaudeville lovers. Their fun is in song and story, with a piano.

The Garcinetti Brothers will add an extra touch of original comedy to the bill with their hat-throwing stunts. By throwing the hats on each others' heads, they interpret various characters by the angle at which the hat is

VANITY FAIR.

The late Ward McAllister, who was a sort of gatekeeper to the society enclosure, tells us in his memoirs of some of the difficulties of his position. It may be said that Mr. McAllister exercised toward the world of society somewhat the same functions that St. Peter is supposed to exercise toward the Kingdom of Heaven. He decided who should be admitted and who should be excluded, and there was no appeal against his verdict. He informs us in the aforementioned book that society aspirants came to him with tears in their eyes, and with their pedigrees and bank books in their hands. If McAllister would but satisfy himself that their credentials were in order, if he would but extend to them a measure of recognition, they would have no difficulty in entering the charmed portals. They would henceforth be among the guests at the most exclusive houses and their pictures would duly appear in the newspapers in more or less close proximity to those of the favorite pugilist, the new movie star, or the much "wanted" criminal.

The study of "society" as presented to us by the newspapers might well engage the prolonged attention of the most agile pen. One would suppose that society was a sort of occupation inconsistent with all the more ordinary pursuits of life. Some one is always "giving it up" in order to do something else, just as one might give up the ministry, for example, for real estate, or cease to be a soldier in order to be a sailor. One can hardly open a newspaper without reading of some such act of renunciation, such as "fashionable young woman gives up society for the study of chemistry," or for the Red Cross, or for community service. One would suppose that the society life was wholly incompatible with any other sort of activity. A choice must always be made. And now the movie has joined in the rather monotonous chorus. The Wild West hero rescues the fair Eastern maid from the villain or the Indians or the hold had men who are in pursuit of innocence and virtue, and of course he would like to marry her, but deep in his chivalrous heart is the haunting dread that she will not be willing to "give up society" for his sake. He need be under no concern upon this point. She will. Here, at least, the movie is true to nature.

It seems quite easy to get out of society. One has only to employ oneself in any way whatsoever and at once the renunciation has been made, or so one may judge from the newspapers. But how does one get into society? New York settled this matter some years ago by boldly publishing a list of the "Four Hundred." Either you were in that list or you were not. There could be no discussion and there was no border line, no twilight zone of uncertainty. Then the list was reduced to the "One Hundred and Fifty," which meant ostracism and social extermination for the excluded 250. It was an autocratic and a heartless proceeding and it was ruthlessly done. But outside of New York there were no such convenient lists. Apparently every little village in the country has its "society," whose doings are recorded with all the solemnity of the metropolis and in identical terms. We read of their "prominent society women" who give ice-cream and cake on the "front stoop" and do all the other things favored by those who have won the coveted prominence and intend to keep it. Society seems to be constituted of a few people who have agreed to be exclusive and who never have any difficulty in persuading their abject and fawning fellow-citizens to do them homage.

Mr. Harrison Rhodes in his "American Towns and People" tells us that Americans, and indeed all the untitled inhabitants of all republics, are never sure of their position. "Ladies in America are discovering at last that, failing patents of nobility or any authoritative list of the Four Hundred, one of the best ways of making people believe you have a social position is to behave as if you had one. We may be thought to cite a case of extreme aplomb in the lovely lady who arrived an hour late for a dinner party on a night when she had not been asked, bringing with her two other guests whom she had taken the liberty of inviting, but whose names she had forgotten! Of course considerable personal charm is needed to carry off this sort of thing, but, even so, indisputable social position only could render it attractive rather than merely careless or rude."

Mr. Rhodes notes the fact that during the war, any woman who did war work was at once described as a society woman who had given up society in order to do so. Of course it was necessary that the work should be somewhat distinctive. If it was unique, all the better. "It would be pleasant, even now, to tell the story of the ambitious lady who failed to get on any of the really fashionable war committees, and ultimately made a delightful place for herself by the fortunate discovery of the obscure but deserving race of Uro-Russicks and the immediate organization of a committee for their relief."

The future of the American society woman is a little dubious just at present. Some of them mean to head the revolution that is supposed to be coming, and so they are busy listening to Bolshevik lecturers in their drawing-rooms and experiencing positively delightful thrills. But there are others, says Mr. Rhodes, who "feel themselves already mounting the tumbrils with a sense of kinship to the French aristocracy of Louis XVI's day—and it may be guessed that it is the ladies most recently arrived in the sacred inclosure of society who feel most strongly how like the old nobility they are going to be in case of trouble."

Heart disease is not the harrier to an active life of usefulness as has always been supposed, said Dr. Frederick Brush to the National Society for the Promotion of Occupational Therapy. Nothing is gained and much lost by telling cardiac patients not to work, not to marry, not to play, and so on. Under proper supervision the person with heart trouble can take a large part in active life.

WILL IRRIGATE AFRICAN DESERT.

One of the greatest reclamation projects the world has ever seen is planned for the heart of Africa. It is nothing less than the irrigation of a desert. The author of the plan, now before the African governing authorities, is Professor E. H. L. Schwarz, and his design is to reclaim vast areas of the Kalahari Desert. Streams draining this arid region are to be dammed and a large shallow lake created, irrigating 10,000 miles of potentially productive territory between the Zambezi and Orange rivers, considered to be among the most promising land in the whole of Southern Africa.

Professor Schwarz is in Europe answering the critics of the project, the chief objection being that the evaporation from the large surface of the proposed storage lake would be so great that it would absorb a very large proportion of the water. Even the critics, however, admit the urgent necessity of arresting the process of desiccation which is steadily increasing over the whole region between the uplands of South and West Africa protectorate on the west to the Transvaal and Southern Rhodesia on the east.

The Kalahari Desert covers fully 120,000 square miles and is part of the immense inner tableland of South Africa, with an average elevation of 3000 feet. It has been called "the Southern Sahara" and like the great desert of the north is arid and scarred by the beds of dried-up rivers.

The soil, however, is different from that of the Sahara. Red sand is on the surface, but occasionally limestone overlies shale and conglomerates. The Kalahari has been likened to an ocean, the ground being undulating, like the ocean at times of heavy swell. The crests of the waves are represented by sand dunes, rising from thirty to one hundred feet. There are also mud flats, which form small brackish lakes after heavy rain. A tough, sun-bleached grass, growing knee high in tufts at intervals of fifteen inches, covers the dunes.

Next to the lack of water the desert's chief characteristics are the tuberous and herbaceous plants and the large numbers of big game. Of the plants watermelons, hatter and sweet, supply water for man and beast; while the game includes elephant, giraffe, eland, lion, leopard, hippopotamus, rhinoceros, buffalo, zebra, quagga, kudu, gnu, and other kinds of antelope, baboon, and ostrich.

The Kalahari is the home of wandering Bushmen who live off the game, killing their prey with poisoned arrows. Along the western border dwell Hottentots, who are cattle raisers. The great bulk of the desert's inhabitants, however, are the Ba-Kalahari, the oldest of the Bechuana tribes; these are natural agriculturists, who cultivate carefully the meagre produce of their difficult gardens, and rear small herds of goats. They have been described as grave and morose.

One curious thing may be related as pointing the need and importance of the work Professor Schwarz plans. Where there is no running stream or open well, and the natives desire water, they tie a long bunch of grass to a reed about two feet long, and insert the end of the reed, with the grass, in a hole dug at a spot where water is known to exist underground, the damp sand being rammed down firmly around it. An ostrich eggshell, the usual water vessel, is placed on the ground alongside. Then the water-drawer, usually a woman, sucks up the water through the reed, cleverly squirting it into the adjacent eggshell, through another reed or a straw, one end of which is in her mouth, and the other in the shell.

Professor Schwarz believes the time is not far distant when the whole of the Dark Continent will be brought measurably within the control of civilization, and urges the Kalahari project as a test of modern scientific methods applied to the rebellious unproductive portions of the earth's surface.

Vincent Pinto of Philadelphia has recently devised a clock which fathers all over this country may find useful! Inside the clock there is a separate mechanism, and when the hands of the clock point to 11 this mechanism is set into operation and a voice issue from the clock, saying: "Eleven o'clock; time to go home!" Thus are callers upon his eighteen-year-old daughter apprised of the hour and a gentle hint is given them that it is about time for them to depart. The hour-hands of the clock are so adjusted that, when the hour of 11 is reached, contact is established with a phonograph inside the clock, on the record of which the fatal words are recorded. The clock is about the size of a grandfather's clock, though according to the inventor, who was a clockmaker in Italy, it could all be packed into an ordinary alarm clock. Mr. Pinto has also fitted up his clock so that it will call the hours, the half and quarter hours, in addition to chimes.

STORYTTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Bobby's mother took him out to the park the other day, and as they stood watching the birds in their enormous cage the little fellow observed a stork gazing at him. "Oh, look, mother," said Bobby. "The stork is trying to see if he remembers me still."

"Have you ever appeared as a witness in a suit before?" asked the bully-ragging attorney. "Why, of course!" replied the young lady on the witness-stand. "What suit was it?" "It was a blue suit with a white collar and white cuffs and white buttons all the way down the back," replied the young lady.

Dickson had been absent from his "office" for several days and on his return a friend insisted on knowing where he had been. "Out to see a friend of mine who has a still," confessed Dickson. "And did you sample his stuff?" the friend demanded. "I guess I must have," he sighed; "there are still two days I can't account for."

A middle-aged suburbanite, overtaken on an afternoon stroll by a young married friend who was taking a memory training course, inquired as to the progress the latter was making. "Doing fine!" was the reply. "Fill your pipe from my pouch—I'll tell you while we perambulate." But the last word was hardly uttered when he made a right about face and returned at the double on his tracks. In the evening he met the middle-aged friend who called to return the pouch. "Thanks," smiled the owner. "I suppose you wonder why I left you so abruptly. Law of association—worked beautifully. The word 'tobacco' followed by 'perambulate' reminded me of something." "Important?" "Well, yes. Don't breathe a word to the wife. I'd left the perambulator outside the tobacco store and the baby was in it."

Fresh from Boston, the lawyer in the frontier town had just finished a glowing summing up for the defense. There ensued a long pause, and the Easterner turned in some embarrassment to the judge. "Your honor," he asked, "will you charge the jury?" "Oh, no, I guess not," answered the judge benignly. "They aint got much, anyway, so I let them keep all they can make on the side."

"Germany's attitude toward peace is ominous," said General Laurin Lawson at a luncheon in Louisville. "Germany reminds me, in fact, of the new parlor-maid whose mistress said to her: 'And above all things I expect you to be reticent.' 'Yes, ma'am, certainly, of course, ma'am,' said the new maid. Then she leaned towards her mistress with shining eyes. 'And what's there to be reticent about, ma'am?' she asked."

"Hiram," said Mrs. Cornstossel, "what hand wagon are you going to ride on?" "Me-hitable," was the reply. "I know how I am goin' to vote, but I won't be flourishin' on any hand wagon. I was not sufficiently prominent to have a seat and be examined by the admirin' populace. I'm only one of the fellers that are supposed to be proud and happy if they are invited to climb down every now and then and crank up the car."

Johnny liked ice-cream, but he drew the line at turning the freezer. One day when his mother returned home she was agreeably surprised to find him working away at the crank as though his life depended on it. "I don't see how you get him to turn the freezer," she said to her husband; "I offered him a dime to do it." "You didn't go at it in the right way, my dear," replied the husband. "I bet him a nickel he couldn't turn it for half an hour."

The speaker was energetically orating in behalf of a candidate for Congress. "What we want," spoke up a man in the audience, "is a man from the rank and file as our representative; a man from the common people, not one of these dudes that don't know anything but how to wear a long-tailed coat." "And that is just exactly what my candidate is," the speaker came back; "one of the common people. And by no stretch of the imagination could you call him a 'dude.' Why, his idea of dressing up is to button his vest."

An American admiral used to tell the following story against himself. He had a congressman for a guest, and having run out of his favorite brand of whisky, made up with some he could not guarantee. He explained this, and added, "Here, however, is some brandy that I've kept untouched, for a good deal more than twenty years." "Hand me over the whisky decanter," was the rejoinder.

"Why?" asked the admiral. "What's the matter with the brandy?" "That's what I want to know, Bob," said the guest; "but if you have had it untouched in your possession for more than twenty years, there must be something pretty bad the matter with it."

A stout woman always took two theatre seats for herself so as to be more comfortable. On one occasion the attendant said: "Excuse me, madam, but who is going to use your second ticket?" "I am going to occupy both seats," replied the woman. "Just as you like, madam, only they happen to be on opposite sides of the aisle."

Bill and Sam met for the first time in several months. It was the conventional greeting, in which each "asked after" the health of the other, and they drew off to one side of the street to have a few moments of conversation. "Where've you been all these days, Bill?" Sam inquired. "You haven't been laid up, have you?" "Yep, been laid up for a time." "You aren't looking awful good. Hope it wasn't anything serious." "Not very serious, but it's the first time I've been out in three months." "What was the matter with you?" "Nothing at all, as a matter of fact, but I couldn't make the judge see it that way."

A certain clergyman always felt it his duty to give each couple a little serious advice before he performed the marriage ceremony. He usually took them aside one at a time, and talked very soberly to each regarding the great importance of the step they were about to take, and the new responsibilities they were to assume. One day he talked in his most earnest manner for several minutes to a young woman who had come to be married. "And now," he said, in closing, "I hope you fully realize the extreme importance of the step you are taking and that you are prepared for it." "Prepared!" replied the bride, innocently. "Well, if I aint prepared I don't know who is. I've got four common quilts and two nice ones and four brand-new feather beds, ten sheets and twelve pairs of pillow slips, four linen table cloths, a dozen spoons and a new six-quart kettle, and lots of other things."

THE MERRY MUSE.

Time to Go.

If she wants to play or sing,
It's time to go;
If o'er your watch she's lingering,
It's time to go;
If she wants your signet ring,
Frat house pin and everything,
(Speak, oh Death, where is thy sting?)
It's time to go.
If the parlor clock strikes two,
It's time to go;
If her father drops a shoe,
It's time to go;
If she sweetly says to you,
"Stay a little longer, do!"
Get your hat and then skiddoo—
It's time to go. —California Pelican.

Hoard.

An aged bibliomaniac,
He stoppeth one of three;
"I seek for ancient magazines
To fill my sets," quoth he.
"I've hunted high, I've hunted low
At bookstores second-hand,
I've tried the men who peddle junk,
But nowhere in the land
"Can I find a trace of what I need To make my sets complete.
My search for periodicals
Seems doomed to meet defeat."
"What ho!! What ho! You aged man,"
The stranger then replied,
"Go forth, go forth as I direct,
And do not turn aside.
"Go, seek the dentist's waiting-room,
The doctor's office, too,
And on their tables shall ye find
The stuff ye have in view!"
"Ye shall find Godey's Lady's Book Of 1817,
And Golden Hours and Lippincott's
And Swinton's Magazine,
"Ye'll find the New York Ledger there
And Puck of '94,
With all the musty almanacs
From centuries of yore.
"So go and loot those waiting-rooms—
I'm giving you the hint—
And you shall find whatever is Completely out of print."
The old man did as he was bid;
He filled his sets, and then
He sold the rest of what he found
To junk and garbage-men.
This made him rich. But dentist folk
And doctors gazed upon
Their waiting-rooms and never knew That anything was gone!
—Berton Bracey in Life.

"I should like to go to New York," said the weary and subdued traveler. "Are you asking for information," said the young woman at the desk, "or are you merely telling your troubles?"—Washington Star.

Father Robert Seson, M. A., will make his first public appearance as a professional reader on Thursday afternoon, December 9th, in the Maitland Playhouse at 3:30, when he will begin a series of readings with "An Hour with the American Poet, Joyce Kilmer." Father Seson was born in San Francisco fifty years ago, attended the public schools in Alameda, and received his degree at Santa Clara College. He spent several years in Italy and France studying music and vocal expression under various masters. He pursued his theological studies at the Gregorian University, Rome, and was ordained a priest in Rome on March 31, 1900. Returning to America, he served as pastor in San Rafael, Mill Valley, and Sebastopol. He then became professor of voice culture and the spoken word in the Catholic University, D. C., in the Dominican House of Studies. During the spring and summer months of the past year he has been in Boston studying expression under Dr. Curry, famous scholar and teacher.

CURRENT VERSE.

A Soul from Prison.

It was a soul from Tartarus
That sought again the upper world,
From past the hill of Sisyphus
And where Ixion's wheel was whirled.

One moment of our mortal year
The tortured soul its freedom gained
From that deep vale of all, most drear,
Where unforgiven ones remained . . .

Reprieved from penitential flame
And Furies' rain of lashes thonged,
The soul on its old errand came
To seek that one whom it had wronged.

Oh, seven times seven times—and more,
Ere then the injured it had met,
Its prayer with sighings to outpour:
"I sinned—hast thou forgiven yet?"

And seven times seven the spirit, spurned,
Had fled to that deep vale of all.
One pardoning word—and it had earned
The Fields that men Elysian call.

Once more it sought the wrong'd one out:
"Hast thou forgiven yet?" it sighed.
"Yea, I forgive thee—have no doubt!"
Most eagerly the other cried.

The soul, from Tartarus set free—
So wan, so seared of lip and brow—Stayed yet to ask: "How may this be, Thou hearest, and dost pardon now?"

Replied the other: "Far away—
Oh, far from here—I climbed a road;
And with me, on that God-sent day,
Went One who bore a heavy load.

"Yet, burdened so, He turned His eyes,
And, searchingly, to me did speak:
'When next the soul from prison cries,
See not in vain that soul shall seek.'

"A further word He spake—'twas this:
'Forgive—wouldst thou forgiven be . . .'
So, haste, thou soul, to taste of bliss
My sin has long withheld from thee."
—Edith M. Thomas in New York Sun.

Riding with Allenby.

As I dream, it seems to me
I have ridden with Allenby!

On a day, in the time long gone,
I rode into the heart of the dawn
Out of Gaza. My desert steed,
Son of a sire of the Nedjid breed,
Took the breath of the morning sun
With never a pause till we had won
O'er rocky sweep and o'er sandy swell
To the riven House of Gabriel.
Then, ere the shut of the eve, we came
Where the last red streamers lit with flame
The mosque of Hebron set in the vale,
With its towering minarets, and its tale
Of Isaac's and of Abraham's tombs,
Where only the Faithful in the glooms
May bow, while faintly the crescents flare,
And the swart muezzin calls to prayer.
Thence on to Bethlehem we sped,
With the dome of Allah overhead,
And never a sign of a cloud in view
To blur the breadth of its gold and blue.

So he marched, and it seems to me
I have ridden with Allenby!

Then Jerusalem, and the hill
Of Golgotha, and the sacred, still Church of the Holy Sepulchre!
The Vale of the Mount, and the ceaseless stir
Of pilgrim feet where the Christ once strayed,
Under the cruel Cross down-weighed!
I rode by Jenin with its palms
Clear cut against the noon-day calms;
I rode by Nablous, I rode by Nain,
And over the wide Esdras plain
Up the slope to Nazareth,
Where out of the dim bazaars the breath
Of the shaven sandalwood was blown.
I skirted the snow-crowned mountain zone
Of Hermon, and saw the morning star
Silver the roofs of Kerf Hawar.
And then I looked on the lovely loom
Of orange, pomegranate, and citron bloom,
(A bowler that to the Prophet's eyes
Was a prescience of Paradise)
And came to Damascus by the gate
That leads to the ancient Street called Straight.

So he marched, and it seems to me
I have ridden with Allenby!

Never again the Turkish blight
On all this land of lure and light!
Never again the brutal ban
From far Beersheba unto Dan!
Rather the beam of His promised Peace
In this home of holy memories!
His peace for all men under the sun
From Nehu north to Lebanon;
His peace through the hand that set them free!

I have ridden with Allenby!
—Chinton Scollard in Asia.

Bridge-Tea.

Social calendars are being busily marked, for Tuesday afternoon, December 7th, has been announced as the date for the next bridge-tea in the Sun Lounge at Hotel Whitcomb. Society folk are not missing any of these teas, that are so charmingly different from the ordinary social activities. Hotel Whitcomb has also filled another long-felt want by securing for these bridge-teas the service of an expert player to instruct those who wish to become more skilled in auction bridge.

ART NOTES.

In the Gump gallery there has been on exhibition a collection painted by Maynard Dixon of really remarkable views of the great West in its most imposing manifestations. This artist has felt and rendered all the wild, natural beauty of the West—its vast, vaporous skies, its rolling prairies, its mountains that bound the prairies, their sides seamed and scarred by ancient water-courses. The artist, in poetic mood, has caught something of the suggestion of the Eternal in those wide, far-distant spaces depicted, which give such a feeling of remote distances that the pictures are like so many openings in the walls.

There are storm-colored clouds fringed by rain whose wetness one can almost feel on the cheek, rolling foothills, and stretches of levels overgrown by the native sagebrush.

There are pictures of hardy rangemen herding the patient cattle, the tepees of Indians, and some striking Indian subjects painted solus.

In fact the author has imprisoned on his canvas the real glow and spirit of the Wild West. There are also some fine Californian views painted in Inyo County.

Another artist, Rudolph Berson by name, has an exhibit in the Rabjohn Marcom gallery, his paintings being confined to land and water-scapes seen along the coast from the bay down southerly.

Mr. Berson's tastes lead him toward the painting of typically Californian scenes stamped with a picturesque quality: various views of the San Juan Capistrano Mission, the bay at Monterey, Fishermen's Wharf, and the like.

The young artist, in spite of his long years of study in Paris, has not got out of touch with the essence of California. His pictures are bathed in the sunshine-colored glow native to this state, and whether he portrays a foggy day, a fishing fleet, a farmhouse, a wheatfield, or a lone pine, the Californian recognizes the native coloring and atmosphere.

Both of these exhibits, we hope, will see the light in New York, where, when the homesick eyes of a wandering Californian rests upon them, their golden glow should dissipate some of the chill induced by an Eastern winter.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"Rutherford & Son," a powerful drama by Githa Sowerby, an English playwright, will be given its first production in San Francisco this coming week at the Maitland Playhouse. "Rutherford & Son" was first produced at the Court Theatre in London and has been declared by critics to be one of the best written plays of the century. It is the story of a man who is the leading factor in a business firm insisting upon old-fashioned methods; methods that are contrary to the desires of his son and finally lead to ruin.

"Fanny's First Play," another first production for San Francisco, by George Bernard Shaw, is giving the audiences this week at the Maitland the keenest pleasure. It is a remarkable performance and bids fair to establish a new attendance record for the season. The Shaw satire will close with Saturday matinee and evening performance.

A New Technic.

An idea of the enormous population of the Chinese nation is given by an English writer who declares that if, in a war, an enemy started killing Chinese soldiers at the rate of 1,000,000 a year, and if China were using 10 per cent. of her population in that war, it would take fifty years to destroy her first armies, and in that time two further Chinese forces of 50,000,000 each would grow up to face the enemy.

The President's Message.

The President's annual message to Congress will be read with a certain sense of disappointment. Its references to domestic affairs are of the commonplace order, perhaps one might even say perfunctory, and its prevailing tone toward the great events of the world is one of despondency.

The chief recommendations urged upon Congress are the passing of the budget bill, economy in expenditures, simplification of taxation, and the proper care of soldiers and sailors. All of these aims are eminently proper. All of them might have been secured long since if the President himself had so willed. The budget bill died under the presidential veto, although it has since been amended. Economy is the remedy for an orgy of governmental extravagance without a precedent in the history of the country. In the same sense it may be said that the simplification of taxation is necessitated by the fiscal incompetence of those who devised the present system. That the vocational training of soldiers and sailors has been so largely a failure is due to the incapacity of those entrusted with the task. Thus the main domestic features of the presidential message are concerned with the rectification of blunders that should never have been made, blunders, moreover, that might have been adjusted long since.

That the President should deplore the failure of Europe to respond to his democratic ideals is perhaps natural. He says that the old world "is just now suffering from a wanton rejection of the principle of democracy." It might be pointed out that the nation that deliberately chooses autocracy because it prefers autocracy is acting quite as democratically as the nation that pins its faith to ballot-boxes. But there is another consideration that may have escaped the President's attention. He went to Europe as the representative of democracy, as a sample, so to speak. But he allowed the whole world to see that his democratic ideals both at home and abroad were consistent with an autocratic bearing to which even Europe was unused, and that he himself had moved heaven and earth, and not without a temporary success, to expunge democracy from the American government. If the President himself had been democratic he might more successfully have recommended democracy to Europe. He should have remembered the good old adage that "handsome is that handsome does."

The Church and Sinn Fein.

The Sinn Fein attack upon the Union Club of New York has been resented by large numbers of Catholics, who object to the identification of their church with a disreputable organization, or with any other movement embarrassing the government in its policies toward foreign and friendly powers. The proper resentment of these Catholics has taken the form of a letter addressed to the Most Rev. Patrick J. Hayes, Archbishop of New York. The letter is so direct, so unequivocal, that it is here printed in full, together with the names of its sixty signatories:

New York, November 26, 1920.

Most Rev. Patrick J. Hayes, Archbishop of New York—

Most Reverend and Dear Archbishop: As Americans and Catholics we protest against the infusion of politics into our beloved church. It is particularly deplorable that an outrage upon American liberty should have taken place upon our national day of thanksgiving, and coming as it did from a mob of people who had just attended mass at the cathedral. In order to remove any doubt as to our condemnation of this un-American proceeding we are sending a copy of this communication to the press.

We are very respectfully,

Those who signed this letter believed that they were doing a duty to their church, as indeed they were. They believed that it should be done in a public way, and they were right. They did not expect to influence the archbishop, who had been so unmindful of his great responsibilities as openly to subscribe to the Irish loan, as to recognize De Valera as president of the "Irish republic," and by his sermons and speeches to inflame rather than to assuage the murderous passions that have been unchained in Ireland. The archbishop is a leader of the Catholic church in America. He knows well that his political opinions are held in abhorrence by large numbers of good Catholics in America and elsewhere. He knows well that his church as a spiritual organization has no more to do with the political aspirations of Ireland than with those of Haiti or the Philippines. He knows well that his behavior is not only an embarrassment to the American government, but that it is actually provocative of war, and that war would certainly have ensued if these reiterated insults to a friendly power had been matched by other and like insults passing westward across the Atlantic instead of eastward. If the Catholic church in America is a participant in international politics, if it is active in support of political schemes that are not American, it is well that we should know it. Indeed, we intend to know it. But if this is not the case, then we must judge the archbishop guilty of subordinating the true interests of his church to his own personal and political sympathies, and in so doing to have played a part that is neither Christian nor American. The letter that has been printed from sixty Catholics of New York is an encouragement to believe that the archbishop does not represent the Catholic sentiment.

But there is something more that must be said to the Archbishop of New York. In his reply to the letter that has been quoted he complains of the "lack of good breeding" that it displays. That, of course, is a matter of opinion that need not here be debated. But the archbishop passes quickly from the question of manners to that of church discipline. He can forgive the discourtesy, but "I can not overlook the more serious breach of Catholic etiquette and discipline. These ill-advised people are guilty of as nice a piece of church Bolshevism as I ever expect to look upon again. The disorder by the crowd on Thanksgiving Day before the Union Club was a serious breach of the law of the land; the protest to the head of the diocese, through the medium of public press, on the part of a few Catholics, most of whom I, though archbishop, never heard of before, is a serious breach of the law of the church, which fixes in her canons the proper procedure for complaint or protest in church matters."

Here we have two "serious breaches of the law," in one case the law of America, in the other case the law of the church. The archbishop seems to think that they are of equal importance, and here we must take issue with him. The law of America was violated when five thousand persons coming from a cathedral mass attacked the Union Club like wild beasts in order to enforce the Sinn Fein practice to display their own foreign flag upon all occasions and to prevent the display of any other foreign flag to which they are pleased to object. Monsignor Lavelle cooperated with this breach of American law when he personally demanded the removal of the obnoxious flag, and he emphasized his misconduct when he appealed to the mob "for love of Ireland." But on the other hand the breach of church law seems to consist in some violation of "the proper procedure for complaint or protest in church matters." Now the Argonaut is not versed in church law. It is unfamiliar with ecclesiastical "etiquette and discipline." Instinctively it dislikes those terms. But it has very definite opinions as to the procedure proper to American citizens who believe that the peace and safety of the country are endangered either by a wanton provocation to other nations or by the crimes of the hyphenated, whose real sympathies are on the wrong side of the hyphen. Publicity is the proper procedure in such cases, even though publicity is not happen to be in accord with the niceties of "etiquette and discipline." That the archbishop should apparently attach an equal gravity to these two breaches of the law, American and church, is alike disconcerting and illuminating. That good and loyal Catholics should thus be arraigned for their proper and public defense of America against those intent upon her embroilment, that they should thus be scourged into the secret channels of ecclesiasticism, is still more disconcerting and still more illuminating. The Argonaut is of opinion that the American public will applaud publicity in defense of America, even though that publicity happens to be a violation of an "etiquette and discipline" that is sectarian rather than national.

In thus dealing with the more aggressive of the American activities of the Sinn Fein it may be permissible to say a word with regard to a certain commission of inquiry into the government of Ireland that is now in session at Washington. The proceedings of this commission are published regularly in the newspapers of the country. They are designedly presented in the form of an official report in order to create the impression of Federal origin and authority. Doubtless they deceive many, as they are intended to do. It ought not to be necessary to say that this commission has no official status whatever. It was instigated by the editor of the Nation, a weekly newspaper that vociferously championed the cause of Germany during the war, that is now offensively Red, and that is actuated, not by a love of Ireland, but by a hatred of England. The "commissioners" were appointed by the Nation, and a glance at their names and records is sufficient to show their predilections and the conclusions at which they are expected to arrive. The British government has naturally refused to participate in this impudent farce, although it willingly gives passports to such of its enemies as wish to offer their worthless testimony. The latest witness to reach America is Mrs. MacSwiney, who emitted a farrago of nonsense in New York and who is now in Washington to edify a commission that is alike bogus and packed, and whose asseverations of impartiality are falsified by the record of its members. The object of the commission is, not to heal the wound, but to inflame it; not to induce peace, but war; not to aid the American government, but to embarrass it. The spirit of this farcical commission is the same spirit that instigated the stoning of American sailors by Irish mobs in Irish towns, and that would gladly have compassed the sinking of every American warship in order that Great Britain might thereby be weakened in her struggle against Germany. We have lamentably learned to identify the American pro-German with the Bolshevik and both of them with the Sinn Feiner. That the reports of this commission should be welcomed and displayed by American newspapers makes of them particeps criminis in an act that verges upon treason. It is a pitiful comment upon their intelligence and upon their patriotism.

The Argonaut believes that the people at large are awakening to a situation that may easily pass beyond their control. If Great Britain had directed against us any one of the insults that we have allowed to be directed against her there would be war at this moment. There would probably be war if she permitted a hostile commission, masquerading as a government commission, to investigate our doings in Haiti or in the Philippines and to summon witnesses from America. There would probably be war if the congregation of—let us say—Westminster Abbey had wrecked a building for the offense of displaying the American flag, or if the House of Lords had ventured to pass a resolution condemnatory of our control of Haiti. Great Britain has not uttered even a word of remonstrance against these wanton outrages. But they have to be stopped. Our foreign relations and our domestic peace shall not be endangered by the Sinn Fein. It is significant of the pass to which things have come that the Argonaut should be nearly the only newspaper in California that does not truckle to and fawn upon these ruffians, that dares to denounce them as traitors to America and enemies of the republic. It is a course that the Argonaut intends to pursue, even though it should become necessary pointedly to direct the public attention to state and municipal officials who seek to attain office through subservience to elements of the population that Americans it is their peculiar duty to abash and to vilify. They gain nothing by this subservience and they have never gained anything. They are despised by the very elements that they try to conciliate, but they are usually too stupid to know this. It may be possible to bring them to some sense of political decency.

President Wilson Joins the League.

Why has President Wilson consented to act as mediator between the insurgent Turkish forces of Mustapha Kemal and the government of Armenia? Is it another example of the "magic wand" idealism that has already wrought such irretrievable mischief throughout the world? Or is it a last-ditch attempt to involve America in affairs with which she is in no way concerned?

It does not matter which it is. It may be either or both. The fact remains that the President, at the conclusion of his term of office, has accepted an undertaking of extraordinary complexity, one that lies at the heart of the European tangle and that involves a treaty, one that must inevitably be bequeathed to his successor, an undertaking that indirectly does the very thing that the electorate has just determined shall not be done. If it be actually true as officially stated from Geneva that General Leonard Wood is to be sent at the head of an army of volunteers, then the situation becomes one of extraordinary gravity. It may easily mean that we shall find ourselves at war with Turkey and in some sort of contact with the Red armies of Russia.

We may reasonably wonder if the President has the least idea of the maelstrom of political forces that centre around Armenia. The Treaty of Sevres, intent upon the weakening and punishing of Turkey, gave to Armenia certain rights and liberties at the cost of the Ottoman Empire. Thereupon Mustapha Kemal, himself in rebellion against the Turkish government for its concessions to the Allies, proceeded to attack Armenia, and was himself attacked by the Greeks, who also were beneficiaries at the expense of Turkey, but who will now probably surrender to Turkey the whole of their gains. In the meantime Russia had been interfering with Armenia and had persuaded the Armenians to adopt a Soviet government, and this Soviet government is now the government of Armenia. When Mustapha Kemal advanced upon Armenia he was sternly warned by Russia to keep his hands off. Lenin wrote him a note to the effect that "Armenia is a Soviet republic. Cease fighting her." At the present time there is an armistice between Armenia and the Turks, the Armenians having renounced their gains under the Treaty of Sevres in favor of Turkey. If the terms of this armistice hold good, if Greece relinquishes her war, as she must certainly do under Constantine, then Turkey becomes practically as powerful as she was before the war. But the Allies can not very well permit the tearing up of a treaty of which the ink is still wet, and a treaty that was intended to secure the impotence of Turkey. But what can they do? They can not make war upon Turkey, nor upon any one else. They can no longer persuade Greece to make war in support of the treaty. Naturally they hail the mediation of President Wilson in the conviction that America will enforce his decisions. President Wilson, in other words, has joined the league of nations.

It is hard to understand why there should be all this knight errantry about the Armenians. No such thing was apparent during the many centuries when Turkey was oppressing and massacring the Serbians and the Montenegrins. The Armenians are the least attractive and the least deserving of all these eastern peoples, and they have now willingly become Bolshevik. Why does the President refuse to negotiate with the Soviet government of Russia and at the same time enter into relations with the Soviet government of Armenia? What difference is there? Actually there is nothing to mediate, seeing that Armenia and Mustapha Kemal are already in agreement as to the restoration of the Turkish power. It looks very much as though the President had set our feet on a road of which no man can foresee the end, a road that we had definitely determined to avoid.

Immigration.

Labor is clearly apprehensive of what may happen to it at the hands of the new administration. Mr. Gompers did all that he could to defeat Senator Harding and he is now afraid of retaliation. But Mr. Gompers may make his mind easy. There will be no retaliation. In point of fact Mr. Gompers took himself a good deal too seriously. He talked largely about the labor vote and as though he could direct it wherever he pleased, but there is no reason to suppose that he controlled a single election. His antipathies were elected and his affinities were rejected in a dozen places. The "labor vote" was just about as mythical as the "women's vote." Some of it went one way and some another in accord with the old rule of party affiliation.

Just now the labor men are clamoring against the flood of immigration and demanding a closer regulation. It will be difficult to secure any comprehensive revision of the immigration laws at this session. The President would be sure to veto any drastic measure and, moreover, congressmen have by no means made up their minds on the matter. On the other hand, there is an insistent popular demand, with the voice of labor leading the chorus, for some provision of law to check immigration. What might very well happen is that Congress, finding itself unable at the short session to revise generally the immigration laws, will enact, before adjourning, a joint resolution suspending the immigration laws for one year and barring all immigrants for that period who can not show an absolutely compelling necessity for coming into the United States.

Such a measure would solve for a moment the Japanese dispute, for it would effectively stop Japanese immigration along with all other.

Release Unto Us Barabbas.

There is nothing particularly new about the gangster outrages that have aroused so much public fury during the last few days. The fury is new, but not the crimes. It is a matter of general knowledge that there have been scores of victims during the last year or so, but their sufferings have not been thought worthy even of a newspaper paragraph. We may estimate the normal official view of such matters from the fact that the district attorney is quick to express his fear that "political pressure" will be exercised in favor of the criminals, and that a police official is equally quick to assuage public wrath by the assurance that the offenders shall henceforth be excluded from the prize ring. It is true that the matter has become much more serious as a result of the murders at Santa Rosa, and probably the prosecutions will now be pushed to a conclusion. But we should much like to know the nature of the "political pressure" foreseen by the district attorney. He is said to have hinted also at pressure from other quarters. What did he mean? Will he not take the public into his confidence and give us details of the organizations that interfere in favor of criminals? Does the new chief of police know anything about these things? This seems to be a propitious time for candor.

The Argonaut is not among those who believe that this disgusting evil is to be cured by the exemplary punishment of half a dozen men, exemplary as their punishment ought certainly to be. Indeed, the evil will be aggravated if the supposed cure is allowed to stop there. Nor will it be cured by the feverish "raids" and "rounds up" in which the official mind delights. We all know what these things mean, and they mean nothing except one more dose of soothing syrup offered to the ever credulous public. The real evil is to be found in the unseen government of the city, in the subterranean powers that supply us with the officials whom we like to think that we have chosen and elected, and who then control those officials just as a showman controls his puppets. There is not a voter in the city who does not know of this unseen government, who does not know that it corrupts our judges and poisons our whole municipal system. With an almost ineradicable apathy we have watched its work, and by our silence we have given to it our consent. There is no essential difference between lawlessness in high places and lawlessness in low places, between official venality and thuggery, between jury fixing and rape. In tolerating one we invite the other, make the other inevitable.

The remedy is to be found, not in punishments, nor raids, nor rounds up, necessary as these things may be, but in elections. And the remedy will not be found until the average voter can be persuaded to cease his perpetual clamor for the release unto him of Barabbas.

Editorial Notes.

We have all heard the pacifist stories of soldiers who lost both legs and both arms in the war and who had to be brought ashore in baskets. As was said of the immortal Mrs. Harris, "there aint no sich a person."

Secretary Baker tells us that no American soldier lost both arms and both legs, nor did any soldier lose both legs and an arm, nor both arms and a leg. Eleven Americans lost both legs at the thigh, one lost both legs at the knee, nine lost both legs below the knee, one lost both feet, and three lost one arm above the elbow and one leg at the thigh. We all know that lies are justified in a good cause, whether it be the winning of a reform election or an advocacy of the league of nations. But this particular lie has now been nailed at the counter. One would suppose that the facts were bad enough without it, but then "every little helps."

What a dreadful thing! Government chemists at Washington are experimenting with poison gases and gas masks. And now there are various gentlemen with long hair and ladies with short hair who are asking how war can be abolished while our own dear government is so active in its military preparations. The Argonaut may confess to sharing in the surprise. It is surprised that the government has so much sense; that contrary to all the precedents it is locking the stable door before the horse has been stolen.

A Republican leader is reported as saying that the solid South will never be solid any more. Prediction is always a hazardous venture, but at least it may be said with certainty that the South is by means solid at the present time. The four states of Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and Tennessee went Republican, the Democratic pluralities of 1916 changing into substantial Republican pluralities in 1920. Moreover, Kentucky elected a Republican United States senator.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

An Irishwoman on Ireland.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 5, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: With great interest I have read articles and letters about Ireland in your interesting paper, and if you will allow me I would like to tell your readers what I know on the subject. I am Irish and have lived a great deal in Ireland and know my people well, and am sure that it is greatly our own fault that her condition is so terrible at present.

When last in Ireland I went into the question of independence with many people in the north and in the south, and with all classes, and I can assure you that the bulk of the best, most honest and honorable people are against any separation from Great Britain, only they dare not say so openly. They said in substance: "We were well off; never so prosperous and peaceful; our sons were not forced into the war, though we were proud of our boys who volunteered and fought so well, and to think that we should be upset in this dreadful way by agitators who have nothing to lose and hope to gain much for themselves, especially foreigners who have no Irish blood in their veins; and does any one think that if we were a republic we should choose a dago (only they used another word) as our president? Do many Americans know that in the year 1800 the Irish Parliament passed an act uniting the island with England, Scotland, and Wales, and this was confirmed by the British Parliament the next year and has lasted 120 years, and during that time England has done well by us?"

I grieve to say that not only foreign agitators, but our Irish priests, have helped to stir up our people to the present state of frenzy. In 1915, when the British Empire was in sore straits, the Rev. Father O'Flanagan, an influential and eloquent priest, in a lecture delivered by him in the city hall in Cork said that he "looked forward to seeing Ireland an independent republic in alliance with Germany, able to use the harbors as submarine bases, from which they could reach out and destroy the commerce of England."

Now could any fair-minded person think that England could allow this?

Then, again, the north refuses to separate from England or to be ruled by the south. "If we are to be given our choice," they say, "we will stay by England, and she can not be so cruel as to abandon us. If she does we will fight and have a separate republic of our own."

I have been told by Catholics here in America that England tries to prevent all freedom in religion and persecutes the Roman church. There is no shadow of truth in this. England has always been noted for her liberality towards all religious beliefs, and in all the countries where her rule has been and the national belief is helped and guarded in every possible way.

Suppose the Mexicans, say in Mexico and Arizona, where the population is more Spanish than American, rebelled against the Union, claiming that they are a separate nation and were there first, and declaring that they wished to be independent and rule themselves, and began to arm themselves, burn Federal buildings, and assassinate Federal officers. I am inclined to think the performance would be stopped with such overwhelming force and so little delay that it would hardly have time to get started. I get many letters from Ireland saying that if Americans only knew the harm they did by interference in Irish affairs and sending money to keep the rebellion going they would be sorry and refrain.

AN IRISHWOMAN.

War on Cancer.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 6, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: This is an announcement that a campaign of publicity is being inaugurated by the American Society for Control of Cancer, having as its object the enlightenment of the lay public in relation to cancer and its many problems, its history, its increasing frequency in occurrence, and the possibility of its cure.

Upon the roster of this society are the names of a large number of men eminent in medicine and surgery throughout the United States and Canada. In the prosecution of this work the society is meeting with very cordial cooperation on the part of the lay press, through whose columns the greatest publicity will be obtained. This is an abrupt departure from former professional traditions. Full justification for its undertaking is manifest in the following facts, all of which are capable of verification:

First—Cancer destroys nearly 100,000 lives annually in the United States.

Second—Every tumor, lump, wart, mole, or chronic ulcer, internal or external, is potentially malignant. In other words, there is a possibility at any period of a transition from the benign to the malignant.

Third—The incidence of cancer has doubled numerically since 1880.

Fourth—Sixteen per cent. of all deaths occurring after the fortieth year are due to cancer in one of its many forms. In other words, 14 per cent. of all males and 18 per cent. of all females who have attained forty years of age will die of cancer.

Fifth—So far as is known up to 1890 no case of breast cancer had been cured by any method. At the present time, and upon the positive statement of the most careful observers, fully 40 per cent. of breast cancers, properly treated within six months after discovery of the growth, can be permanently cured.

Sixth—A much larger percentage of cures are effected in the smaller and more superficial growths. In this variety of cancer permanent cure can be effected without extensive operation and frequently without any operative interference. Such patients experience little or no pain or loss of time. Frequently the patient can continue at his work during treatment.

Seventh—Proper treatment in chronic ailments of internal organs preclude the later incidence of cancer. It is a well-known fact that cancer is prone to develop in the scars succeeding chronic ulceration of the stomach, bowel, and other internal organs. Fully 90 per cent. of cases of stomach cancer are known to have suffered originally from gastric ulcer.

A fuller development of the various phases of this subject will appear in the lay press from time to time, and it is to be hoped that the dissemination of accurate knowledge concerning this general subject will result in a more rational procedure on the part of those who are threatened or those who are suffering from incipient malignancy.

This undertaking will be locally in charge of the undersigned, assisted by Dr. Alton R. Kilgore of San Francisco.

M. PAUL HYMANS.

On the 6th of April, 1886, Ernest Renan, in one of the Hibbard lectures on Rome and Christianity, said: "Politics is not everything here below. What the world wanted, after the frightful butchery of centuries of antiquity, was gentleness, humanity. Of heroism they had had enough; those martial goddesses, eternally brandishing their lances from the summit of an acropolis inspired no more emotion. The earth, as in the time of Cadmus, had devoured its most noble sons."

In the choice of M. Paul Hymans as president of the league of nations there has perhaps been an unconscious recognition that a military conception of the future will appeal to few in a world once more so mortally sick and tired of strife. He is the personification of urbanity. His fine, keen, intellectual face radiates bonhomie, his manner is one of winning cordiality. That he can stiffen into immovable determination he proved very lately, resigning from his position as minister of foreign affairs in Monsieur Delacroix' cabinet rather than give up one jot of those principles for which he stood. Though a Liberal, he is, in appearance and finesse, very much of an aristocrat, exquisite, fastidious, contemptible, reserved. His self-control is often misunderstood, and he is characterized as cold, but nobody who ever heard him speak in public during the war could give ear to such a verdict. He speaks in clearly modulated, almost measured accents, and his voice, though light in timbre, is vibrant and has extraordinary carrying power, so that each word is crisp and sharply audible, but his emotion takes the form of passionate intensity rather than of fiery eloquence. He has the literary instinct for the right word, and his speeches read as well as they sound. In listening to Lloyd George one is inclined to wonder whether he is not sometimes the victim of his own impassioned fervor, but Monsieur Paul Hymans leaves one no loophole for irrelevant personal reflections; he holds his subject and the attention of his audience in a grip that never relaxes for an instant till his voice ceases, and he has that rare gift in an orator—he knows when to stop.

Newspaper reproductions have made his face familiar to the man in the street. His fine-profile has the clean-cut precision of a head on a Roman medal. That thin, pale, almost colorless countenance with its regular features, the full gray hair en brosse, the gray moustache clipped squarely over a small, mobile, most humorous mouth, is given added force of character by eyebrows, so thick and black that they are almost like stage eyebrows, stuck on above eyes of clear, penetrating brilliance. His spare figure, erect and lightly built, that seemed to grow visibly thinner during the heavy years of 1914-1916, when he was minister to the Court of St. James, is wiry and strong as steel—and his mind has much of its temper. Polished, witty, and even sharply ironic as he may be when occasion arises, he is the product of a civilization the war has done much to obliterate. In our rougher code of manners one might be inclined to question whether a man so suave could be at the same time sincere, but it is only necessary to appeal to Monsieur Paul Hymans on some question about which he feels strongly to see how his eyes flash, his mouth hardens, and out comes a defense of his point of view so succinct that there can be no possible doubt in the mind of his hearer as to his real opinion. In public he may be, he undoubtedly is, a master of the art of conversational fencing, of feeling his way to a conclusion that shall voice the general sentiment, even if it is at variance with his own. In the world of politics and diplomacy it is too often necessary to subordinate personal preference to policy, but on momentous matters his record makes it safe to infer that he would stick very obstinately to his guns, at whatever cost, against any odds, with scrupulous and self-sacrificing devotion.

Tense and highly strung, he preserves nevertheless, even under attack, an enviable demeanor of pleasant calm. Those who have been fortunate enough to see Monsieur Hymans at home, either in London or in Brussels, may be pardoned for wondering how much of that calmness and poise he has caught from Mme. Hymans. Small, slender, delicate, with beautiful, pensive eyes and low voice; speaking very little, but always to the point; at once persuasive and intelligent; with such ready graciousness in the dignity of her quiet presence, she is the most restful, the most unaggressive of modern women.

Perhaps no man was ever confronted with a more colossal task than Monsieur Paul Hymans in August, 1914. From a small prosperous state of comparative insignificance Belgium was suddenly uplifted into a position of tragic preëminence; the whole world hung breathless upon the desperate defense of those young, untried Belgian troops; and her ministers to France and Great Britain had to assume overnight a burden of responsibility almost overwhelming in its weight. In those early days, with the horror of war almost stupefying the great mass of his compatriots, His Excellency Monsieur Paul Hymans became, not only the mouthpiece of his suffering country, but the centre around which every one of the energies of those tremendous days revolved.

His imperturbable quiet, intense but decisive, wasted no force on any expression of the obvious. Like his great compatriot, Cardinal Mercier, he seemed always master of his time; there was in his manner nothing of the hurried, harassed, almost breathless absorption which was the somewhat trying attitude of lesser men and women in high positions. They received each visitor with an eye on the clock and one finger on the bell which was to end the interview which had not yet been begun. If Monsieur Hymans was swayed by the same intolerable impatience, his unruffled serenity never betrayed it. He could, however, rebuke an inconvenient inclination to digress by no greater severity than was implied by a shade of deeper gravity in his own demeanor, but no one was quicker to seize the relief of a swift witticism, which lent a welcome gleam of humor to the grimmest situation. During the short time accorded to any visitor, even in those packed, relentless hours, he gave to each subject under discussion the most complete and unwavering attention.

At a time when impatience, not to say ill-temper, is the note of international relationship it is invaluable to have at the head of the most important experiment in the history of the world a man of such consummate tact and intelligence, with a mind and tongue so disciplined. His power of concentration, his long experience as a diplomat and as minister of foreign affairs during the most difficult years before and since the end of the war, should make him an admirable president of that league of nation which must ultimately develop and grow out of the present inchoate and incomplete assembly. The appointment of a man at once so supple and so sincere, of such imperturbable urbanity and savoir faire, who nevertheless remains a practical idealist, imbued with the humanizing spirit of modern internationalism, a man of high principle and scrupulous integrity, should fill with hope those to whom the unutterable stupidity of violence has been driven home with the cruellest force during the six years in which, in some form or other, it has grimly and hideously persisted.

JULIE HELEN HEYNEMAN.

While various experiments had been made with so-called "laughing gas," or nitrous oxide gas, in America prior to 1846, it was seventy-four years ago this month that the first practical operation under ether was performed in the Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston. A peculiar feature was that the sulphuric ether was given, not by one of the house physicians, but by a young dentist, who had been experimenting on himself and had gone to sleep for eight minutes. He rushed over to the hospital and asked a chance to demonstrate his discovery. A man about to have a tumor removed from his neck gave permission to have the "new-fangled dope" applied. The dentist went to work and the tumor was removed. The patient, opening his eyes after the operation, cried, "Gentlemen, this is no humbug," and with that remark ether was given to the medical world. Oliver Wendell Holmes came forward with a name for the process, and the liquid and the dictionary gained "anesthesia" and "anesthetic." In three months it was being used throughout the civilized world.

THE HOLY HERMIT OF LISSADELL.

Rosamond Langbridge in the "Manchester Guardian."

It was the people of Lissadell who said he was a holy hermit, although, to do him justice, he never gave it out himself that he was that. But what else would he be at all, with a mat of big, long hair down to his shoulders, and a beard he never cut, and terrible long nails on him? And hadn't he said to Matty O'Kane, when Matty offered him half of a bar of kitchen soap—Sure, what would he want with the like of that? For, if he didn't wash himself, sure enough he must be very holy, for didn't Saint Bride herself say she would think shame to scour her sinful body with a cake of, scented soap? And then, again, there was the terrible fright the sight of a shawl put him in, and weren't all the sainted martyrs that same way?

Mag Mahony, who was in dread of nobody, was the first woman he had spoken to in Lissadell. With relentless curiosity she had pursued the hermit to the opening of his hut, purely to put the question to him: Was it true what the people were saying—that the herons watched the waters of the little loch for fish for him, and when they had it caught, would hold it in the beak, "as cute as a pet fox," until the holy hermit had taken the fish away from them? When Mag had asked him that, gravely he had bent his head, as if, perhaps, to imply, "Oh, is that what they are saying?" but Mag noticed that he had not contradicted it. So it went round Lissadell that the herons fed the holy man; for, if they did not, where else would he get his bit and his sup? For never a copper coin was seen on him; he did not beg, he never worked, and he never went next nor nigh a shop. And wasn't it a sure thing that a harmless, poor hermit would do no poaching in McGinty's woods, for all that Miss McGinty had once remarked she got the smell of something extra good, and it rising out of the black pot over the hermit's stick fire? But Miss McGinty "had no nature," for she was a sour old maid. Then, plainly, it was as true as truth—the herons fed him.

On the outskirts of McGinty's woods the hermit had fixed himself a shanty beside the stony shore of the little loch, fern-fringed and heron-guarded. One wall of the shanty was formed by the wall of the craggy hill against which he had reared the hut; and the hut itself was nothing but a furzy den, furze-thatched and bracken-lined, with a tiny hole in the furze for a window, and an opening for the door so low that the shawled women who scared the life from him had the tireless joy of watching him crawl from them to the safety of his fastness upon his hands and knees.

It became known, however, that no shawl would be accepted altogether which carried an offering of apples, potatoes, or even a pig's foot in its folds. And in this manner, gradually, the women overcame his shyness, and at the same time quenched the great thirst of their curiosity; and whatever chat he had with them was wise, and sometimes wonderful, until at last it grew the custom to consult the hermit on whatever thing was ailing you. The bigger the matter, of course, the bigger the lump in the folds of your shawl. In this way the reputation of the hermit was a thousandfold increased, for it did not take long for Lissadell to discover that the most startling intuitions which fell from his ascetic lips were in the matrimonial and courting line. And, he being a single holy man who was disgusted at the bare sight of a shawl, how would he get these foreign revelgious matters to his holy, harmless ears.

It was Matty O'Kane who first dared, with the help of the cooked half of an old hen, to bring such sacrilegious amters to his holy, harmless ears.

"Holy sir, I am this great while courting Katie Shanahan, with pardon to you," he said, "and she'll have nothing to say to me. What would I do to make her come around?"

"Are you visitin' the house much?" inquired the hermit, after a moment of meditation.

"Me shadder is never away from the door," replied Matty.

"Sure, I knew that," said the hermit, "before 'twas out of your lips. Take your big brogue and your long shadder from the door, and it won't belong before she's lonesome after you.

"For the women will fret
After what they can't get.
What is under their shawl
They don't vally at all."

Matty was so taken by the rhyme that the hermit got the other half of the old hen that was put by for Matty's supper. And after that Mag Mahony came to him. She was only three months married, and already her husband was neglecting her. "And what was the cause of it, now?" said Mag.

"You are a small little bunty of a woman," replied the hermit, and something came into his eye like the flash in the eye of a wicked ass. "but there is one part of you is too long altogether, and that is the part of you that's doin' the damage."

"And what part of me is that?" said Mag. "And I've a lovely pair of home-knit socks for you that'll be as soft as moss on your two feet if you'll make me a poetry-rhyme the same as you made it for Matty O'Kane."

"What is waggin' and red,
And stuck fast in your head?"

Replied the hermit.

Mag thought a moment, and then she burst out laughing at her own cleverness. "And is it my tongue, holy man?" said she.

"If you want to keep love, let you coo like the dove, And not screech like the cocks. An' now where is me socks?"

replied the holy man.

"I am thankful to you for the poetry-rhyme," said Mag, as he was going, "but there's great wonder on me that the saints do be talking secrets to your innocent reverence the same as they'd do to any ould married man."

One evening a dusty-footed stranger-woman tramped into Lissadell, from a great distance, by the look of her, to consult the holy man. Mag Mahony, Matty O'Kane, and a few others volunteered to put her on her way, and they arrived there as the sun was going down upon the hermit's evening meal. The embers of his brushwood fire still glowed, and he was drinking from the stony loch, as the stranger-woman drew along the road to him. One glance, however, at the company, and the hermit dashed like a rabbit for his den.

"He must be very holy," said the stranger-woman, in a voice which sounded as though it might hold the possibility of sarcasm, "for he's as shy as the young hares."

"He is always that way," answered the company, "at the cut of a strange shawl."

And now they heard the hermit feverishly engaged in putting up his nightly barricade before his door.

"Come out to me, your reverence," said the stranger-woman, "for I am in great straits with the Devil's own vagabond of a husband that has left me and ten little childer purely starving in the home, while he goes traipsing the world's end for his own content."

There was a moment's pause, and then the hermit was heard speaking in a foreign whine which did not seem to resemble his old familiar tones.

"Let you quit bothering," he replied, "for I am at me exercises."

"Put out your hand to me through the winder, so," replied the stranger-woman, "that I may get the good of your blessing if I can't see your face."

"If I do so," replied the hermit, "will you go 'way, for you have me annoyed?"

"Oh, I will so, holy man," said the stranger-woman.

After a longer pause than ever a great, black, hairy hand appeared.

"Aha!" screamed the stranger-woman. "Fast have, fast hold!" and she seized hold of the hairy hand with all the strength of her own two. "Come out to me, ye idle vagabond, or I will have you in Roscommon Gaol!"

Then the hermit uttered a string of curses so horrible that the company feared to be blighted, and fled, screaming, to a little distance from the spot.

They watched. Then they saw the stranger-woman make the gesture of one who snatches up a lighted stick from the embers and stoop beside the hut. And slowly smoke curled upward from the holy hermit's den. Finally it seemed as though some violent cataclysm overthrew the hut, and out of it the hermit leaped, sky-high, the people said, and went running, running, running down the road to Lissadell, and after him ran the stranger-woman brandishing a lighted torch.

Charles V. King of Spain and Emperor of Germany in the sixteenth century, was a pious ruler. Toward the end of his life he conceived the curious idea of rehearsing his own funeral, not because he wished to have the event go off without a hitch when the time should come, but because he thought the performance of the ceremony would redound to the credit and well-being of his soul in the after world. His friends sought to dissuade him, but deeming it a holy act, the ruler went ahead with his preparations. A catafalque was erected and the service performed. The high altar, the catafalque, and the entire church shone with wax lights; the friars were all in their proper places and the household of the emperor attended in deep mourning. "The pious monarch himself was there, attired in sable weeds," according to the monkish historian, "and bearing a taper, to see himself interred and to celebrate his own obsequies." While the mass for the dead was sung, he came forward and gave his taper to the officiating priest as a symbol of his desire to yield up his soul. Not only once, but for many years, until he finally died in 1558, Charles V performed this strange ceremony annually.

Samuel Rzeszewski, the nine-year-old Polish chess marvel, has arrived in America to match his skill against that of the best players to be found. He has defeated many of the best players in Europe. The wonderfully carved chessmen pictured on the board before him were presented to the lad by a wealthy European whom the boy defeated in a game played simultaneously with twenty-five opponents.

Milton Dana Morrill, American architect and inventor of a system of home building, has just left for France to direct reconstruction of homes and buildings on a large scale. In his system the buildings are made of concrete and it is planned to utilize the immense quantities of broken stone, brick, and other debris available. His system and services are donated under auspices of the French restoration fund.

Mrs. Harding, wife of the President-to-be, is sociable without having the love of formal society. She likes to chat. She has been a horsewoman, an out-of-doors woman. In Marion she was known as a woman of independent ideas. Neither she nor her husband is a great reader. She likes politics. She likes to participate in activities until recently regarded as men's spheres. She heartily believes in woman suffrage.

Eliphalet Remington, hale and hearty and with eyes well nigh as keen as those of a boy, recently celebrated his ninety-second birthday. The oldest of America's living inventors, he is a splendid contradiction as to the theory that there is no such thing as the aristocracy of genius. The Remingtons for three generations have given impressive evidence of the persistence of a creative strain marked by the production of many extremely useful things in the realm of mechanics.

Charles Lathrop Pack, president of the American Forestry Association, is the man who has gained an international reputation as a result of everlastingly and eternally talking and writing upon the subject of planting trees. According to the belief of this hustling and exceedingly useful man, no person—man, woman, or child—has really commenced living until he has planted a few hundred trees on some highway or in a lot or field. Mr. Pack is strongly urging the municipal authorities of every hamlet, village, and town throughout America to immediately secure an adequate-sized piece of land and plant trees on it for the purpose of creating a municipal wood lot which would mature in the not far distant future. He believes that by pursuing this course it would be but a comparatively few years until many homes would be heated largely with the use of wood, using coal only during the severest zero weather of the winter.

Knut Hamsun, the Swedish novelist, playwright, and poet, who has just been awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature for 1920, has, since the death of Strindberg, been regarded as the greatest living writer of fiction in his native country. Hamsun, who is sixty years old, has been married twice, his first wife having divorced him. He has reached his present eminence despite the handicap of a scant education. This education has been picked up haphazard between his work as a coal heaver, road mender, surveyor, farm hand, street-car conductor, lecturer, and free-lance journalist. The distinguished Swedish author visited this country twice in the middle 'eighties, on one trip working on the Chicago street-cars after failing as a lecturer. On his return to Sweden he wrote a book on "The Spiritual Life in America," which was decidedly unflattering to us. The Nobel Prize for Literature has been withheld since 1916. The award, which will be formally presented to Knut Hamsun on December 10th, is the seventeenth Nobel Prize for Literature to be given.

THE ROMANTIC.

May Sinclair Tells a Story of the War and of the Psychology of Cowardice.

There are two ways—perhaps more than two—by which we may discover the hidden motives of human behavior. We may learn the true relation between cause and effect, and this comprises the science of psychology, or we may attain the same end by intuition—whatever that may be. Women are supposed to have a peculiar facility in the use of the latter method, but it sometimes fails them when they are in love. The scientist prefers the intellectual way.

In this war story by May Sinclair we have the two ways contrasted, and science wins. Charlotte Redhead has had a love affair with a married man who has finally thrown her over in favor of his wife, Effie. Now she is in love with another man, John Conway, and once more she has allowed herself to be swept away on an emotional tide. She tells her friend, Gwinnie, all about it, and Gwinnie, not being in love, has the use of her intuition:

"I, sa-ay—"

Gwinnie's voice drawled in slow meditative surprise. The brooding curiosity had gone out of her face. Gwinnie's face, soft and schoolgirlish between the fawn gold bands and plaited ear hoppers of her hair, the pink, pushed out mouth, the little routing nose, the thick gray eyes, suddenly turned on you, staring.

Gwinnie had climbed up on to the bed to hear about it. She sat hunched up with her arms round her knees rocking herself on the end of her spine; and though she stared she still rocked. She was happy and excited because of her holiday. "It can't make any difference, Gwin. I'm the same Charlotte. Don't tell me you didn't know I was like that."

"Of course I knew it. I know a jolly lot more than you think, kid."

"I'm not a kid—if you are two years older."

"Why—you're not twenty-four yet. . . . It's the silliness of it heats me. Going off like that, with the first silly cuckoo that turns up."

"He wasn't the first that turned up, I mean. He was the third that counted. There was poor Binky, the man I was engaged to. And Dicky Raikes; he wanted me to go to Mexico with him. Just for a lark, and I wouldn't. And George Corfield. He wanted me to marry him. And I wouldn't."

"Why wouldn't you?"

"Because Dicky's always funny when you want to be serious and George is always serious when you want to be funny. Besides, he's so good. His goodness would have been too much for me altogether. Fancy beginning with George."

"This seems to have been a pretty rotten beginning, anyway."

"The beginning was all right. It's the end that's rotten. The really awful thing was Effie."

"Look here—" Gwinnie left off rocking and swung herself to the edge of the bed. Her face looked suddenly mature and full of wisdom. "I don't believe in that Effie business. You want to think you stopped it because of Effie; but you didn't. You've got to see it straight. . . . It was his lying and fudging that finished you. He fixed on the two things you can't stand."

"The two things. The two things."

"I know what you want. You want to kill him in my mind, so that I shan't think of him any more. I'm not thinking. I only wanted you to know."

"Does anybody else know?"

"She shook her head."

"Well—don't you let them."

Gwinnie slid to her feet and went to the looking-glass. She stood there a minute, pinning closer the crushed bosses of her hair. Then she turned.

"What are you going to do with that walking-tour johnnie?"

"John—Conway? You couldn't do anything with him if you tried. He's miles beyond all that."

"All what?"

"The rotten things people do. The rotten things they think. You're safe with him, Gwinnie. Safe. Safe. You've only to look at him."

"I have looked at him. Whatever you do, don't tell him; Charlie."

Charlotte begins to see signs of John Conway's real nature, but being in love she will not understand them. She finds him shivering and retching after tending on a sick cow, and that reminds her of something else:

But before that—the night they went to Stow Fair together; crossing the street at the sharp turn by the church gate, something happened. They hadn't heard the motor-car coming; it was down on them before they could see it, swerving round her side of the street. He had had his hand tight on her arm to steer her through the crowd. When the car came . . . when the car came . . . he let go and jumped clean to the curb. She could feel the splash-board graze her thigh, as she sprang clear of it, quick, like a dog.

She was sure he jumped first. She was sure he hadn't let her go before the car came. She could see the blaze of the lamps and feel his grip slacken on her arm.

She wasn't sure. He couldn't have jumped. He couldn't have let go. Of course he hadn't. She had imagined it. She imagined all sorts of things. If she could make them bad enough she would stop thinking about him; she would stop caring. She didn't want to care.

Charlotte tells Conway of her past experience and then he asks her to live with him, but of course everything is to be good and pure, and the real psychologist will know just what that means:

"I don't. I'm glad you told me. I'm glad it happened. I mean I'm glad you worked it off on him. . . . You got it over; you've had your experience; you know all about it; you know how long that sort of thing lasts and how it ends. The baseness, the cruelty of it. . . . I'm like you, Charlotte, I don't want any more of it. . . . When I say I care for you I mean I want to be with you, to be with you always. I'm not happy when you're not there. . . ."

"I say, I wish you'd leave this place and come away and live with me somewhere."

"Where?"

"There's my farm. My father's going to give me one if I stick to this job. We could run it together. There are all sorts of jolly things we could do together. . . . Would you like to live with me, Charlotte, on my farm?"

"Yes."

"I mean—live with me without that."

"Yes; without that."

Then comes the war. Conway and Charlotte join an ambulance corps and there is some talk of amalgamating their unit with another under the charge of Sutton and Dr. McClane. But McClane is a psychologist. He knows that Conway's sentiment and emotionalism are the mask of his cowardice:

Charlotte was in the space between the glass doors, arranging their stores in their own cupboard. McClane's stores had overflowed into it on the lower shelves. She could hear the two men talking in the room, Sutton's low, persuasive voice; she couldn't hear what he was saying.

Suddenly McClane brought his fist down on the table. "I'll take you. And I'll take your women. And I'll take your ambulances. I could do with two more ambulances. But I won't take Conway."

"You can't tell him that."

"Can't I?"

"What can you say?"

"I can say—"

She pushed open the glass door and went in. McClane was whispering furtively. She saw Sutton stop him with a look. They turned to her and Sutton spoke.

"Come in, Miss Redhead. This concerns you. Dr. McClane wants you and Miss Denning and me to join his corps."

"And how about Mr. Conway?"

"Well—" McClane was trying to look innocent. "Mr. Conway's just the difficulty. There can't be two commandants in one corps and he says he won't take orders from me."

Field service is the strain that is to break John Conway's nerve. Can he conceal his cowardice. He makes the effort, but the yellow tint can not be wholly hidden even at the first:

The three wounded men lay stretched out on this floor, among brickbats and broken panes and slabs of dropped plaster. A thin gray powder had settled on them all. And by the side of each man the dust was stiffened into a red cake with a glairy pool in the middle of it, fed from the raw wound; and where two men lay together their pools had joined and overflowed in a thin red stream.

John put down his stretcher and stood still. His face was very white, and his upper lip showed indrawn and dry, and tightened as though it were glued to his teeth.

"John, you aren't going to faint or be sick or anything?"

"I'm all right."

He went forward, clenching his fists; moving in a curious drawn way, like a sleep-walker.

They were kneeling in the dust now, looking for the wounds. "We must do this chap with the arm first. He'll want a tourniquet."

He spoke in a husky whisper as if he were half asleep. . . . The wounded head stuck on the floor. They scraped round it, digging with their hands; it came up wearing a crust of powdered lime. A pad and a handage. They couldn't do anything more for that. . . . The third man, with the fractured shin-bone and the big flesh-wound in his thigh, must have splints and a dressing.

She wondered how John would set about his work. But his queer, hypnotized actions were effectual and clean. Between them they had fixed the tourniquet.

Through all her preoccupation and the quick, dexterous movement of her hands she could feel her pity tightening her throat: pity that hurt like love, that was delicious and exquisite like love. Nothing mattered, nothing existed in her mind but the three wounded men. John didn't matter. John didn't exist. He was nothing but a pair of hands working quickly and dexterously with her own. . . . She looked up. John's mouth kept its hard, glued look; his eyes were feverish behind a glaze of water, and red-rimmed.

Charlotte watches Conway as he returns from a battlefield. His face is sallow—white and drawn and glistening. From the contemptuous behavior of his companions Charlotte knows that something has happened:

The windows stood wide open to the sweet, sharp air. She heard Mrs. Rankin and Sutton talking on the balcony. In that dreadful messroom you heard everything.

"What do you suppose it was then?" Mrs. Rankin said.

And Sutton, "Oh, I don't know. Something upset him."

"If he's going to be upset like that every time he'd better go home."

They were talking—she knew they were talking about John. "Hallo, Charlotte, we haven't left you much tea."

"It doesn't matter."

Her hunger left her suddenly. She stared with disgust at the remains of the tea the McClane Corps had eaten.

Sutton went on. "He hasn't been sleeping properly. I've made him go to bed."

"If you can keep him in bed for the duration of the war—"

"Are you talking about John?"

"We are."

"I don't know what you're driving at; but I suppose he was sick on that heastly battlefield. It's all very well for you two; you're a trained nurse and Billy's a surgeon. . . . You aren't taken that way when you see blood."

"Blood?" said Mrs. Rankin.

"Yes. Blood. He was perfectly all right yesterday."

Mrs. Rankin laughed. "Yesterday he couldn't see there was any danger. You could tell that by the idiotic things he said."

"I saw it. And if I could he could."

"Funny kid. You'd better get on with your tea. You'll be sent out again before you know where you are."

Charlotte is to see her lover actually running from danger and leaving her to face it alone and with a wounded man. He has gone into a house in search of a casualty:

Then she saw John come out of the door of the house and stand there, looking up and down the street. Once she saw him glance back over his shoulder at something behind him in the room. The same instant she heard the explosion and saw the shell burst in the middle of the street, not fifty yards from the ambulance. Half a minute after she saw John dash from the doorway and run, run at an incredible pace, towards his car. She heard him crank up the engine.

She supposed that he was going to hack towards the yard, and she wondered whether she could lift up the Belgian and carry him out. She stooped over him, put her hands under his armpits, raising him and wondering. Better not. He had a bad wound. Better wait for the stretcher.

She turned, suddenly, arrested. The noise she heard was not the grating noise of a car hacking, it was the scream of a car getting away; it dropped to a heavy whirr and diminished. She looked out. Up the road she saw John's car rushing furiously towards Ghent.

The Belgian had heard it. His eyes moved. Black hare's eyes, terrified. It was not possible, he said, that they had been left behind?

No, it was not possible. John had forgotten them; but he would remember; he would come back. In five minutes. Seven minutes. She had waited fifteen.

There comes another time when Charlotte and Conway are in danger of being taken by the Germans. Conway wants to run, but Charlotte refuses to leave a desperately wounded Belgian. She insists that he be carried with them out of danger:

He lay on his side on the flagged floor of the kitchen. His shirt was ripped open, and in his white hack, below the shoulder blade, there was a deep red wound, like a pit, with a wide mouth, gaping. He was ugly, a Flamaud; he had a puffed face with pushed out lips and a scruf of red beard; but Charlotte loved him.

They carried him out through the wood on to the road. He lay inert, humped up, heavy. They had to go slowly, so slowly that they could see the wounded and the Red Cross men going on far before them, down the street.

The flagged road swayed and swung with the swinging hulge of the stretcher as they staggered. The shafts kept on slipping and slipping; her grasp closed, tighter and tighter; her arms ached in their sockets; but her fingers and the palms of her hands were firm and dry; they could keep their hold.

They had only gone a few yards along the road when suddenly John stopped and sank his end of the stretcher, compelling Charlotte to lower hers too.

"What did you do that for?"

"We can't, Charlotte. He's too damned heavy."

"If I can, you can."

He didn't move. He stood there, staring with his queer, hypnotized eyes at the man lying in the middle of the road, at the red pit in the white hack, at the wide, ragged lips of the wound, gaping.

"For goodness' sake pick him up. It isn't the moment for resting."

"Look here—it isn't good enough. We can't get him there in time."

"You're—you're not going to leave him?"

"We've got to leave him. We can't let the whole lot be taken just for one man."

"We'll be taken if you stand there talking."

He went on a step or two, slouching; then stood still, waiting for her, ashamed. He was changed from himself, seized and driven by the fear that had possessed the men in the plantation. She could see it in his retreating eyes.

She cried out—her voice sounded sharp and strange—"John—! You can't leave him."

The wounded man, who had lain inert, thinking that they were only resting, now turned his head at her cry. She saw his eyes shaking, palpitating with terror.

"You've frightened him," she said. "I won't have him frightened."

She didn't really believe that John was going. He went slowly, still ashamed, and stopped again and waited for her.

"Come back," she said, "this minute, and pick up that stretcher and get on."

"I tell you it isn't good enough."

"Oh, go then, if you're such a damned coward, and send Mac to me. Or Trixie."

"They'll have gone."

He was walking backwards, his face set towards the turn of the road.

"Come on, you little fool. You can't carry him."

"I can. And I shall, if Mac doesn't come."

"You'll be taken," he shouted.

"I don't care. If I'm taken, I'm taken. I shall carry him on my back."

While John still went backwards she thought: It's all right. If he sees I'm not coming he won't go. He'll come back to the stretcher.

But John had turned and was running.

Conway goes from bad to worse. Maddened by the revelation of his cowardice, he revenges himself on Charlotte by revealing her early love affair. McClane tells her why he had always mistrusted Conway. He knew him to be an out and out degenerate. "He suffered from some physical disability. . . . It went through everything. It made him so that he couldn't live a man's life. He was afraid to enter a profession. He was afraid of women." Then comes the end, so far as Conway is concerned. He is shot by the servant of a wounded man whom he is about to desert under fire:

"Billy—what did happen, really? Did he leave the German?"

"The German?"

"Yes. Was that why he shot him?"

"The German didn't shoot him. He was too far gone, poor devil, to shoot anybody. . . . It was the Belgian captain that he left. . . . He was lying there, horribly wounded. His servant was with him; they were calling out to Conway—"

"Calling to him?"

"Yes. And he was going all right when some shrapnel fell—a regular shower bath, quite near, like it did with you and me. That scared him and he just turned and ran. The servant shouted to him to stop, and when he wouldn't he went after him and put a bullet through his back."

"That Belgian boy?"

"Yes. I couldn't do anything. I had the German. It was all over in a second. . . . When I got there I found the Belgian standing up over him, wiping his bayonet with his pocket handkerchief. He said his rifle went off by accident."

"Couldn't it? Rifles do."

"Bayonets don't. . . . I suppose I could get him court-martialed if I tried. But I shan't. After all, it was his captain. I don't blame him, Charlotte."

It is a pitiful story and relentlessly told by an author who has something quite definite to say and who says it with all the vigor to which she has accustomed us.

THE ROMANTIC. By May Sinclair. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Experiments made in France have, it is reported, shown that the yellow and green colors possessed by the silk spun by certain caterpillars are due to coloring matter derived from the food and passed through the blood of the spinners. By impregnating leaves with artificial colors the experimenters caused some species of caterpillars to produce silk of bright orange-yellow and fine rose hues. By the aid of the spectroscope the presence and nature of colored pigments in the blood of the little creatures was established.

Last year the United States produced $100,000,000 worth of rubber products.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending December 4, 1920, were $138,000,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $175,600,000; a decrease of $17,600,000.

The Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco gained $13,804,000 in gold during the week, according to the statement of condition at the close of business on December 3d. The report shows a total gold reserve of $177,700,000.

The panic of 1920 is the panic of 1907 over again with the exception that, through the offices of the Federal Reserve Board, there is an elasticity in our banking facilities that permits banks generally to go through the crisis without that sort of visible reflection of stress in the way of thousands of anxious depositors them would be reaping a big loss instead of what they had reason to expect would have been a fair profit.

It entails considerable time and an immense amount of financial misfortune to shake the business of the country down to a secure level, and during the shaking-down process it is only natural that thousands of holders of securities should be seeking a market for them at any price obtainable.

We are now in the last stage, it is believed, of this development so far as the Stock Exchange is concerned, and November is the typical fall month for Stock Exchange prices to reach their lowest levels, from which at least we may reasonably look for a splendid recovery. There are some intimations that the decline may run into December, but it looks as if a great many important stocks may have seen their lowest for this year at least before the first of next month. And considering the safest things to buy we must certainly not overlook the good public utility issues which in the general smash in prices have gone down perhaps even in proportion with stocks of companies whose businesses have been declining and whose profits have been falling off and whose surpluses have been wiped out, whereas in the case of the public utilities these very things have meant increased buying power, increased profits, and a frightening future all around. And of course public utilities include the railroad stocks. When industrials are considered we should pay particular attention to those companies which cater to the public utilities, for we may look for an enormous amount of buying of equipment of various sorts during 1921.—The Trader.

Judge Gary's statement as to the Steel Corporation price policy is cryptic, to say the least. The corporation has its order books well filled and it is only the natural thing for its head to insist on maintenance of its price schedules so long as conditions remain unchanged. It is apparent enough that independent interests have altered their high ideas as to prices, which are so rapidly settling down to the Steel Corporation schedule that in order to keep plants going at all it is likely that even a few weeks or months at most will see the independents under-cutting the chief factor in the trade.

Since 1906 there has been an increase in the ingot capacity of the trade of at least 30,000,000 tons, or 130 per cent. It is admitted that with its enormous business and relatively small "overhead" the corporation can produce at a profit at selling levels that would bankrupt the independents if endured for long. There is enough steel business in the world to be done to keep our plants going at rather full capacity if the proper credit facilities were obtainable. Plans are forming for the organization of numbers of important companies under the Edge law whose sole purpose will be the fostering of international trade. This development will be watched with acute interest.

There is a fair business doing in copper now, and the turn in that market should come within ninety days, as perhaps in metals generally.

"Agricultural interests have finally come to see that the hanking and business situations are not such as to encourage the holding of commodities off the market in the hope of seeing prices rise. Deflation has been going on everywhere and prices for the products of farms and plantations have been going down in pace with the trend of prices for things mined or manufactured. Much short selling has taken place, but we may only look for short covering rallies in cotton and the grains.

Following the substantial upward movement which had prevailed without interruption since the middle of August, during the current month the trend of corporate and government bond prices has been downward, tax-exempt municipal and state securities constituting an exception to this general trend (says the National Bank of Commerce in New York). The downward movement would seem to be temporary in character. In some degree it reflects conditions in the stock market, where liquidation has been severe. It reflects, also, the continuation of high rates for money and the heavy volume of offerings of both domestic and foreign securities which have been marketed in recent months. New offerings continued in large amount into the current period, but have tended to diminish as bond prices have declined. There is, however, a very large financing still waiting a favorable market, and this factor may be expected to occasion future fluctuations, such as that now current, in the general upward movement of bond prices.

William Sproule, president of the Southern Pacific Company, has returned to San Francisco, after an absence in the East of thirty days or more. Coincident with his return, announcement was made from the New York offices of the company that the directors have decided upon a plan for separating the oil properties controlled by the company from the Southern Pacific railroad properties, pursuant to a declaration by the board of directors about a month ago that they had approved the principle of separating these properties, and called upon the executive committee of the company to submit a plan. Commenting on this plan, President Sproule said: "It is in the nature of a distribution to Southern Pacific stockholders of the oil properties that are now controlled by the Southern Pacific interest. After the plan takes effect, the Southern Pacific Company will cease to be interested in the oil business except as a purchaser of oil for fuel on the one hand and as a common carrier of oil on the other hand.

"In taking this action the company is simply responsive to the spirit of the times and the plan puts the properties in the possession of the stockholders as individuals, each stockholder being given the right to acquire a share in the oil properties to the same extent that he has a share in the railroad property.

"It will be observed that the new oil company will be known as the Pacific Oil Company. It will include the oil lands of the Southern Pacific Land Company, as stated in the announcement, and so much of the shares of the Associated Oil Company as the Southern Pacific now holds. The Associated Oil Company, however, and its subsidiary companies are separate entities, regardless of whether the Southern Pacific retains its stock or divests itself of its stock as now announced.

"The plan is intended to inure to the benefit of Southern Pacific stockholders and will place the majority stock of the Associated Oil Company in very strong hands for the purposes of the oil-producing and refining business in which that company is engaged."

South San Joaquin Irrigation District, San Joaquin County, California, is advertising for bids to be received on January 11, 1921, for $180,000 South San Joaquin Irrigation District 3½ per cent. bonds, dated September 1, 1919, due serially 1950 to 1956.

These bonds are part of a total authorized issue of $500,000 voted July 5, 1919, for general improvement purposes, of which $200,000 were sold earlier this year at 102.40 and interest, or a 3.30 per cent. basis.

The South San Joaquin Irrigation District embraces an area of more than 71,000 acres, having a present estimated population of 8000, and includes the cities and towns of Manteca, Ripon, and Escalon. Dairying, alfalfa, fruits, almonds, vegetables for canning industries, and diversified general farming are the principal industries.

Bonds of this district are issued under the supervision and control of the state irrigation bond commission and are certified by the state to be legal for all funds which may be invested in county, city, or school district bonds. They are also eligible to secure public deposits in California banks and exempt from all Federal income taxes.

Cyrus Peirce, of Cyrus Peirce & Co., has just returned after six weeks spent in New York and Eastern financial centres. Discussing the situation throughout the country, Mr. Peirce said:

"The financial situation in the East seems to be slowly clarifying. It is generally believed that stock exchange liquidation has pretty well run its course. Shrinkages in certain industrial stocks have been very great. The Wall Street Journal printed a list of fifty prominent industrials which have shown a decrease in market value of two and a half billion dollars from the high point of a year ago to present quotations. This, of course, should be reflected by a large decrease in stock exchange loans. The general opinion is that money will work easier from now on.

"Deflation in commodity prices has been very great as far as the manufacturer and the wholesaler are concerned, but retail prices have not yet been adjusted to meet the new levels. This adjustment should take place to a large extent within the next sixty days.

"The financial institutions in our large centres have been preparing for a long while to meet present conditions and are generally in good condition. Some few bank failures have occurred in North Dakota and the Middle West, but they have been small institutions which are not members of the Federal Reserve System. For that reason no great significance is attached to this phase of the situation.

"One of the chief causes of stringency in the money market has been the fact that our surplus of exports over imports for the year ending July 1, 1919, was $4,000,000,000 and for the year ending July 1, 1920, was $3,000,000,000, making a total balance due us of approximately $7,000,000,000. Of this amount only about half has been paid, which leaves approximately three and one-half billion dollars of credit in the hands of export houses, the foreign credit banks, and some of the large manufacturers. This amount can not be completely liquidated until the exchange situation is materially improved by the import of foreign goods as an offset, and of course this situation has been the cause of a good deal of financial pressure.

"Much of the decrease in price of industrial stocks has been caused by a fear which is not entirely warranted. Of course, these corporations must take a decrease in inventory value, but in most cases they have built up large surpluses during the last five years and such decreases in inventory can be written out of their surplus without in any way affecting the soundness of the company. If, for instance, a corporation has accumulated a surplus of $100,000,000 in five years and must take a $25,000,000 write-off at present—what of it? That is what the surplus is there for, and while of course it will decrease the value of the stock somewhat and while the earnings will necessarily be impaired during this readjustment period, there is no reason whatever to question the soundness of any such institution if well managed.

"The bankers of the East are meeting the situation in a very broad way, and it is their avowed intention to take care of every good company.

"Constructive financing is being done, as, for instance, during the last week of November it was announced a pool had been formed, to which the New York bankers contributed $12,000,000, the Boston and Chicago bankers each $8,000,000, and other bankers smaller amounts, to be used for loans to cattle breeders in order to prevent the necessity for the sacrifice of any of the breeding herds of the country. in line before paying tellers' windows of the country. The present panic has been striking every corner of our business world, and it is the exception where the individual of any means whatever has not been compelled to sell something against his will and at any price obtainable.

This, of course, is merely the aftermath of the period of riotous extravagance and exploitation of buying power which reached its height a year ago. The accumulated pyramids of fortune have vanished, and in many places great holes have been left representing deficits in place of surpluses. Mr. A. B. Hephurn, the veteran financier, says that "wholesale welching on contracts" has been mainly responsible for the embarrassments in our commercial business. Last year almost every line of business was invaded by a host of parvenues who floated to temporary success on the tide of rising prices. Their bank accounts were large and their successes seemed so real that it is not surprising that even rather conservative trade interests were found doing business with them on a large scale and on a credit basis. When prices began to crumble and the business of these parvenues began to show losses instead of profits, repudiation of contracts became the rule with most of them. They would say merely that they couldn't pay, and if their creditors wished their goods back they could have them; but, of course, in the meantime the prices of these goods had declined to such an extent as to mean that those who had sold breadth of vision that is being shown by the bankers of the country today."

State Mineralogist Fletcher Hamilton and W. W. Thayer, secretary of the mining bureau, recently returned from a two months' trip which covered every county in California, which was taken for the purpose of arousing the public to the necessity of actively and aggressively supporting the measures of relief for gold mining which are embodied in the McFadden bill. This bill was introduced but not acted upon by the last Congress, and provides for an excise tax of $10 an ounce on new gold in manufactured articles.

At the present time mining costs, as well as all others, have increased over 100 per cent. as compared with 1914, yet the gold miner receives no more for his product than he ever did. If the gold output all went into the national reserve, or was used for monetary purposes, it might not be advisable to advocate this measure, but it so happens that at the present time every ounce of gold being produced in the United States is being absorbed by the arts and trades, and in addition this year $30,000,000 worth of gold will have been drawn from the mint—over and above the nation's output—and used as a commodity. This means that the manufacturer using crude gold is being subsidized by the United States government; his raw material is made available in unlimited quantities at pre-war prices; his selling price can be fixed to suit his own convenience, and the gold miner pays the bill.

This situation has placed the gold miner in an untenable position, and the point has been reached where financial ruin is staring him in the face, if he has not already succumbed. "One appears to be traveling in the wake of a pestilence," said Mr. Hamilton, "in visiting the mining districts where the industry was founded which brought California into existence, and from whence Nature's golden harvest has been poured forth for the past seventy years. Towns and whole counties are being depopulated. Mines are being allowed to fill with water and mills and reduction plants are being abandoned to the elements."

The bureau officials conferred with business men and commercial organizations in every section visited, and they report that the sentiment is unanimous, among those who have any realization of the facts in the case that the gold industry should be given immediate relief, not as a philanthropic proposition, but as a matter of sound business. Without adequate relief, gold production will practically cease; without gold production, the nation's gold reserve—already dangerously low—will continue to shrink; and without a proper gold reserve, the "business depression" which even now exists would be followed by conditions of panic the final effects of which can not be foretold.

to say about the Chinese reorganization loan:

"The recent signing of the International Banking Consortium, under which the United States, England, France, and Japan will outline a comprehensive and constructive programme for the reorganization of taxation, currency reform, and public improvements of the Chinese Republic, and which will probably result ultimately in the flotation of a new Chinese loan in this country, has called the attention of the American investing public to the Chinese reorganization 5 per cent. loan of 1913, due 1960. These bonds in 1914 and 1915 sold at about $92 per $20 piece in the American market and the equivalent price in London and Paris. We offer these bonds, subject to change in price, at $48 net flat per $20 piece.

"We desire to impress on you the fact that the Chinese government has always met promptly the interest and sinking funds of its various loans.

"The above bonds are secured by the Chinese salt tax revenues and the Chinese maritime customs revenues, which are collected by representatives of the great powers and which last year, after the payment of all charges, amounted to over $30,000,000 United States money.

"The interest on these bonds is payable in pounds, francs, or yen, and at the present time, if collected in sterling, the straight return on the money invested is over 7 per cent. and if collected in yen over 10 per cent.

"Beginning in 1924 a minimum of £245,940 bonds are called annually by operation of the sinking fund. With exchange at $3 the call value of each $20 piece or 505 franc piece is $60, and each 50-cent advance in the value of the pound automatically increases the call value of each $20 by $10.

"We believe that a large market will ultimately be developed in this country for the above issue. The bonds have always been highly regarded in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. As this market develops and the sinking fund becomes active, we are of the opinion that the bonds will readily command a much higher price, which price will be further improved by any increase in the rate of sterling or French exchange.

"In view of the excellent opportunity for large profits, we believe an investment in these bonds is worthy of careful consideration."

E. H. Rollins & Sons are offering 7 per cent. bonds of the Balfour Building, Incorporated, at par.

This offering is of $500,000 of a first closed mortgage issue of $1,000,000. The capital stock is owned by Balfour, Guthrie & Co., one of the oldest commercial firms in San Francisco, and the Union Insurance Society of Canton, Limited, which is retaining $500,000 of these bonds for its own investment.

Ninety per cent. of the space in the fifteen-story Balfour Building, at the southeast corner of California and Sansome Streets, has already been leased, and the earnings for 1921 are estimated at over twice bond interest and over one and one-half times bond interest and serial payments. The appraisement of the lot by Thomas Magee and the construction cost of the building total $2,100,000, showing an equity in the property above the bond issue of 100 per cent.

Stephens & Co. are offering Sacramento and San Joaquin Drainage District Feather River Project No. 7 (California) 7 per cent. warrants to yield 8½ per cent. These warrants are drawn by the state controller on order of the state reclamation board and payable by the treasurer of the State of California out of Sacramento and San Joaquin Drainage District Federal River Assessment No. 7.

The above project comprises a total of some 35,000 acres of agricultural lands in Sutter and Yuba counties with an assessed valuation approximating $1,750,000, against which warrants in a total amount approximating $375,000 will be issued. The purpose of the issue is to provide payment for flood control levees on both sides of Feather River. The approximate per acre estimated value is $100, the assessed value $50, and the debt $11.

The validity of the Reclamation Board Act has been upheld by the Supreme Court of California and the legality of the warrants approved by Messrs. Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick of San Francisco.

According to estimates of the reclamation board as stipulated in the construction contract the assessment roll will be completed and filed with the board by May 1, 1922.

Charles A. Warren & Co. own and offer $250,000 8 per cent. accumulated preferred stock and $125,000 common stock of the Columbia Feature Photo-Plays, Incorporated, of San Francisco. The company is incorporated under the laws of the State of California. Preferred stock, non-assessable, at par value of shares $50 each and sold in units two shares of preferred stock and one share of common stock, par value $150. Cost of unit $100, and sold on easy terms.

Charles A. Warren & Co. say: "In offering the preferred stock of the Columbia Feature Photo-Plays, Incorporated, 8 per cent. cumulative preferred stock with a bonus of common stock, to the investors of San Francisco and environs, we believe that we are doing a twofold service in that we are offering an investment which we expect to pay a good return, and at the same time we are doing San Francisco a service by bringing here a permanent producing company which will undoubtedly be the forerunner of many more like organizations. San Francisco capital is now being largely invested in providing studio facilities, but it will require producing concerns to make the studio investments profitable. The Columbia Feature Photo-Plays, Incorporated, presents a proposition to San Francisco investors which is a well-rounded-out enterprise. It has the star, experienced management, the stories, the director, the release, and fully equipped studio for the finished production. Thus nothing is left to chance or the future. No motion-picture enterprise which has had the foregoing combination has ever been other than a financial success."

Among those participating in the offer of $25,000,000 Consolidated Gas Company of New York one-year secured 8 per cent. gold notes is the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company. These coupon notes are in denominations of $1000, dated December 1, 1920, and interest, payable June 1 and December 1, 1921.

Direct obligation of the Consolidated Gas Company of New York and secured by pledge with the trustees of $34,000,000 par value capital stock of the New York Edison Company, the present annual dividends upon which alone exceed the amount required for interest on these notes.

The large equity over and above the funded debt is represented by $100,000,000 par value common capital stock outstanding. The company has paid dividends on its stock continuously for over thirty-five years, the present rate being 7 per cent. per annum.

Gross earnings for the year ending October 31, 1920, exceeded $79,000,000, of which 57 per cent. was derived from the electric business.

The company and its subsidiaries do practically all of the gas, electric light, and power business of Manhattan, and a large part of Bronx, Queens, and Westchester counties. Population served, over 4,000,000.

A syndicate headed by E. H. Rollins & Sons, Cyrus Peirce & Co., and Bonbright & Co. is offering at 100 and interest $1,500,000 par value Great Western Power Company of California general mortgage convertible 8 per cent. bonds. This is the second series of a total issue of $5,000,000, of which the first $3,500,000 was offered with great success last August. Local investors will remember that the first offering was entirely absorbed within a very few days. This second series closes the general mortgage.

These bonds are all to be called by lot within the next ten years at 105 and interest. When the bond is called the holder may, if he wishes, convert it, par for par, into first and refunding mortgage Series B 7s, due 1950, receiving a cash bonus of 5 per cent. Thus an investment in this issue gives a yield of from 8.35 per cent. to 10.75 per cent. (according to the year in which the bond is called by lot) and in addition carries with it an extremely valuable conversion privilege whereby the bondholder may obtain a long-term, 7 per cent. underlying bond on favorable terms.

This issuance of the second series has been authorized by the California state railway commission to reimburse the treasury for expenditures already made on the Great Western Power distributing system and to provide funds for additions and betterments to this system during the next year. This financing marks another step in the development of California hydro-electric power resources, upon which development the industrial and agricultural progress of this state is to such a great extent dependent.

An issue of $1,189,150 worth of bonds, obligations of the famous Glenn-Colusa Irrigation District, is being offered at a price to yield 6.50. This is a serial issue, the bonds maturing from January 1, 1925 to 1934, and the issue has been validated by the superior court of Glenn County.

More than 100,000 acres are in this district, with a bonded debt of $2,587,000, or a little more than $25 an acre. The assessed value of real property in this district is over $6,000,000, with an estimated actual value of more than $12,000,000.

This irrigation district is approximately in the centre of the Sacramento Valley, which is noted for the variety of crops.

The soil of the district is described in the government soil report as willow clay adobe, willow clay loam, and river loam. Rice, barley, wheat, maize, corn, and alfalfa are the principal crops. The live stock census shows in the district approximately 86,000 sheep, 14,000 hogs, and 4200 head of cattle.

Funds derived from the sale of these bonds are to be used to acquire a canal system and to reconstruct and enlarge the water ways. The issue is placed on the market by a syndi-

Tahiti Days.

This is the title of a book about Tahiti by a British officer who made a pretty comprehensive tour over the islands about Tahiti during the days when influenza was carrying off the unresisting natives by the thousand. This phase, however, plays but a small part in the book, the author, Hector MacQuarrie by name, having gone to those regions in search of health, and seeking a cheerful atmosphere determinedly.

Eventually he ended up at Tahiti during the height of the epidemic, organized a hospital and a hospital staff, and made a desperate attempt to save lives. It is a pitiful record, this, of the childlike fatalism with which the natives yielded to the idea of death, but the last but one chapter is the only sad one. The remainder of the book pictures the primitive natives, their simple joy in living, and the ready hospitality which they always offer to the deified white man. The author is rather indiscreet in the masculine unreserve he displays in his revelation of the joyous immoralities of the natives and half-breeds. He even mentions names, seeming not to realize that books about the once happy isle are handed about by the educated half-breeds and whites and pretty generally commented on, their authors, when too indiscreet, as in the present case, being apt to incur the reprobation and animosity of their former friends.

Mr. MacQuarrie looks at the matter entirely from the masculine point of view. For from the men the natives make no concealment of their primitive animalism, while, with a sort of artless instinct, practicing a decided reserve with the white women who visit the island.

Mr. MacQuarrie's book contains a number of true stories of island romances between the natives and descriptions of life and character types in the neighboring Society Islands. There is a chapter given to a description of the religious rite of walking on the white-hot stones, the author having joined in the rite and come off unscathed, but unable to explain the true inwardness of the immunity from being burned.

Also he gives a minute description of pearl diving as practiced at the island of Hikueru, speaking with all the more authority from having himself worn diver's spectacles and dived into some of the caverns of the reef, in order to observe the wonderful beauties of the under-sea gardens of nature.

The merit of "Tahiti Days" is its readable quality, its South Sea atmosphere, and the joy conveyed by the author in his pleasant experiences. The book is handsomely printed and freely illustrated from photographs, although the pictures are of mediocre quality.

Puritan and Pagan.

Imitation may be the most genuine form of compliment, but it is one of the unhappiest means to use in the practice of any art, if for no other reason than that it invites comparison.

That the author of "Puritan and Pagan" is a student of Henry James one only guesses from the frequent—all too frequent—repetition of some of the master's pet terms. The recurrence of the word "fairly"—never used by James but in the most delicately exact sense—leaps at the hapless reader from well-nigh every page. He becomes morbidly sensitive, develops prescience, learns to brace himself—teeth on edge—and rush past the odious adverb. Truly that disagreeable exercise is the chief impression he carries away from the book.

But there is a secondary impression. It is that Miss Corbett has chosen her title, then written her thesis, supplying enough and just enough characters, incidents, etc.—not the happiest way to write a book. She has determined that it will be a psychological thesis and accordingly sets herself to analyze and diagnose the mental states of her four victims. Such a study, if accurately done, would have been interesting reading—though far from being a novel—if the types selected had been interesting. As it is, they are three variations of that most familiar of all psychological make-ups, the artistic temperament.

If there is a third impression, it is an unpleasant consciousness of the labels attached to the three principal puppets. They are as unwearied in displaying their own labels as in indicating those of their friends. In short, they wear their "Puritan" or "Pagan" labels on their sleeves, in lieu of the hearts it behooves a novelist to supply in order to turn puppets into persons.—R. G.

Gossip of Books and Authors.

When Stevenson landed in Samoa one of the first persons to meet him was the Rev. W. E. Clarke, who introduced himself to "R. L. S." and soon became his best friend in "the Islands." Stevenson frequently visited Mr. Clarke in his home at Apia and sometimes accompanied him on his missionary journeys. Mr. Clarke was with Stevenson at the time of his death; he made the funeral address in the Samoan language on the mountain-top where the author of "Treasure Island" was buried. Out of his intimate knowledge Mr. Clarke has written for the January Yale Review his memories of "R. L. S." and his household in Samoa. He gives several characteristic letters from Stevenson which have never before been published.

Some one told Carlyle that Margaret Fuller had decided to accept the universe, to which Carlyle responded: "Gad, she'd better!" John Burroughs uses the phrase "Accepting the Universe" as the title of his new volume of essays upon philosophical subjects, published by the Houghton Mifflin Company.

It is definitely announced that Gilbert K. Chesterton will pay his first visit to the United States in January for the purpose of lecturing.

In "Italy and the World War," his book of revelations which has just been published by Charles Scribner's Sons, Thomas Nelson Page, former United States Ambassador to Italy, devotes considerable space to a defense of Italy's motives in the great conflict. Mr. Page's ambassadorship covered the entire period of the war and he writes of personal observation and experience.

A personal record of uncommon value in its picture of some of the backgrounds of this changing day is "Diplomatic Reminiscences Before and During the World War, 1911-1917," by A. Nekudoff, which has just been brought out by E. P. Dutton & Co.

Trick Horses.

It is not always wise to teach a horse to play tricks, as is proved by a story told by an English army officer.

John Leech's inimitable circus borse that insisted on sitting down with his rider whenever he heard a band play was the prototype of a horse belonging to an officer who, in a weak moment, had taught it to rear up and "salzam" whenever he leaned forward to make a bow.

It was all very pretty when the officer was out riding and met any lady of his acquaintance, but it became a nuisance when he was out pig-sticking in India. He would lean forward to meet the rush of a charging boar with his spear—up would go the beast on end just at the moment when the man's safety depended on his taking a true and deadly aim with his spear point. The consequence was that the animal's hind legs showed many scars from boars' tusks, and he was lucky that he did not end his career with his body ripped open.

The officer had, too, at one time a fine but somewhat nervous charger. One day on a parade the mount suddenly gave way with the officer and quietly lay down. The rider thought for a moment he was ill, but on rousing him he immediately sprang to his feet again, quite fit and well. A week or so later when riding with a friend they stopped for a moment to admire the view, when down the horse went. It was evident to the officer that he had been trained to lie down at a given signal, but the man never could discover for the life of him what that signal was.

Potatoes will cost more than they are worth to transport three hundred miles under the new freight rates in Canada. Then there is the cost of getting them to the consumer. The answer would appear to be, "Raise your potatoes where you are."

AN AMERICAN FINANCE ORPHANAGE.

The establishing by means of American funds of a home in England for British boys orphaned through the war, the sons of British navy and army heroes, puts a new link in the chain of international friendship that binds us to those of our own strain across the sea.

The orphan home financed by America is at Reading, forty miles from London. It is an "adopted" home, the National Allied Relief Committee through its English representatives deciding, after much searching and many investigations, to take over what is known as the St. Andrew's Home of the Waifs and Strays Society of England, an institution already equipped, perfectly fitted for their purposes. It would have been a year or more at the least before there could have been built and fitted out such a building. The St. Andrew's Home, "ready made," is ideal, and the offer of the Waifs and Strays Society to turn it over was gladly accepted.

Colonel the Honorable Arthur C. Murray is chairman of the British Management Committee of the National Allied Relief Committee; Major the Honorable J. J. Astor, treasurer; Evelyn Wrench of the English-Speaking Union, secretary, and Lieutenant-Colonel A. S. Cleaver, Robert Grant, Jr., G. Mills McKay, and James Van Allen Shields its other members. The new orphanage will be under its direction and under the protection of the British Ministry of Education.

At the meeting at the Savoy Hotel formally founding this American orphanage in England, America's memorial to British heroes, the check for its carrying on was presented by John Moffat, who had brought it from America. Only a few days before Mr. Moffat was received at Buckingham Palace and decorated as commander of the Order of the British Empire, King George tendering him the thanks of the British people for his work for the Allies during the war.

The new orphans' home will care for forty-eight boys. Its purpose will be to develop them into strong, upright, and efficient Britishers. The home that American funds are paying for is a picturesque old gray stone building, with lawn, playgrounds, and garden space.

The boys attend the public schools in Reading, and also receive all necessary home training at the hands of Head Master J. G. Churchill, who holds a lieutenant's commission in the British army, and Mrs. Churchill, who is matron of the home. The boys are also attached as a cadet corps to the Berkshire Infantry Regiment, which gives them both military and physical training.

The National Allied Relief Committee, Inc., sponsors of this new movement, is made up of Americans who from the early days of the war saw a great duty lying before them. It is composed of New Yorkers who have traveled widely, know the countries abroad and have many close friends in them. As a body it saw the needs of England and France as if it were actually on the ground. During the war it sent over many hundreds of thousands of dollars—hundreds of thousands of pounds, indeed—for relief of the Allies. When war came to an end it found its work must be continued.

Church on Wheels.

The Pilgrim Fathers established the right of man to worship as he pleases. Since then a whole lot of other fathers have assumed the right of man to worship when he pleases. And that is very seldom, indeed. Kansas City, Missouri, has its church problem, like every other American city. It has been estimated conservatively that about one-third of its population of more than 300,000 attend normally.

It was to raise such low averages that the Rev. Charles E. Draper came forward with a scheme of "The Church on Wheels." He is pastor of the Martha Slavons Memorial Methodist Church, which stands in a thickly populated part of Kansas City's residence district. His active congregation, even his summer congregation, is by no means the smallest in town. But it wasn't large enough for the Rev. Mr. Draper.

Motor-cars—Sundays—touring—church attendance. There was the association of ideas and a possible solution! Dr. Draper assembled the men of his congregation and expounded his idea. They were all for it. At the morning service the important part motor-cars were to play in the evening prayer-meeting was explained.

At 8 o'clock that night the members of the congregation drove up to the church in their motor-cars. They didn't park and alight, for they beheld Dr. Draper, their pastor, standing erect in the tonneau of his car, which was stationed beside the church in a large vacant lot. The pastor smiled and bowed his greeting, signaled, and a corps of assistants suddenly were changed into temporary traffic patrolmen, directing the cars into a semi-circular formation about the automobile of the pastor.

The families sat, obviously delighted with the comfort of their mobile pews. The dignity of the assemblage was perfectly preserved and there were no late-comers. More than fifty cars were parked in the lot and at the curbs. Their occupants accorded close attention as the preacher launched into his sermon.

"To serve a modern world, so must a church be modern," Dr. Draper began. "This is my 'Church on Wheels.' Many churches, you know, have been racing their engines and just burning up gas," he continued. "It's time to stop this."

"The Church on Wheels" appears to be an established institution. Services were announced immediately for the succeeding Sunday. And it is planned that they continue until indoor weather comes on.

A SERIES OF HUMAN-INTEREST TALKS ON INSURANCE

NORMAN RUSHTON
The man who takes care

A business man isn't safe—without insurance

There come times in every business when money is needed to meet unusual financial pressure.

The money must often be raised immediately. A delay of even a few days means absolute disaster.

The one solid rock that can be trusted at such times is life insurance.

Your bank will loan you money on your insurance to tide you over, or we will gladly loan you.

Thousands of businesses have been saved by life insurance. Thousands of others have gone to the wall for lack of it.

This same insurance allows a business to remain stable after the removal of its owner. It gives sufficient money to sustain the loss of business while reorganization is being effected by those to whom the business has been left.

Leading bankers advise life insurance as a business protection. They state that life insurance is an absolute business necessity. They loan more money to men who carry life insurance than to those who don't.

I believe that it would be decidedly to your advantage to learn of the benefits of life insurance as a business asset. Phone me and we can arrange a time to suit your convenience. Kearny 4048.

West Wind Drift.

Since the days in 1719, when Defoe's "Robinson Crusoe" startled an admiring world, shipwrecks on desert islands and the events consequent on such catastrophes have been a favorite source of plot material for authors of the adventure story. That the topic is a favorite one with Mr. McCutcheon we know of yore from "Nedra." Many are the six-reeled thrillers owing inspiration to "Nedra."

Mr. McCutcheon is to be commended on his latest variation of the shipwreck melodrama in that it is a variation from the version most popular on the screen—that of one man and one woman being miraculously saved and cast upon opposite rims of the same island. In "West Wind Drift" the author is kinder hearted, and saves practically all on board, several hundred men, women, and children.

Critically speaking, the book is not a novel in any sense of the word. A novel is a three-dimensional sort of thing, and "West Wind Drift" is a linear, strictly. It is a prolonged tale of the Picaresque type best rendered in about a third of the length given to the present volume. In another form of art, the string of incidents that carry the yarn to its improbable end would make a good libretto for a musical comedy of the Gilbert and Sullivan type. But the author missed his chance and dressed his story in the serious garb of a novel. There is not a light touch in the book. Instead of using his comic-opera setting for the nonsensical romance it deserved, Mr. McCutcheon builds a modern Utopia. The book should be immensely popular with socialists of the old-fashioned order. Viewed from another angle, the narrative of the adventures that befell the doomed Doraine and its passengers from the date of sailing literally up to the present moment would, if more succinctly told, and shorn of its sentimentalism and civic moralizing, have made a first-rate salt yarn of the sort Joseph Conrad writes so inimitably. But Conrad never makes the mistake of novelizing a yarn.

If "West Wind Drift" had been told as a sailor's yarn one would swallow the improbable ending with a grin. As it is the reader wonders whence Mr. McCutcheon derives his omniscience. Since the author presumably took as his point of departure the name of a ship mined in the early days of the war—a ship that sailed and was never heard of again—he can not end his story with a happy rescue. So much is obvious. But the alternative of leaving his people on the island evidently "for good" is a false note as far as verisimilitude goes. How in the world does the writer know the fate of the Doraine? That is a question that would not disturb the equilibrium of a salt yarn, but it sets the structure of "West Wind Drift" toppling. No.

- ☞ I have read with keen interest every one of his novels that you have published thus far.
- ☞ They are all works of distinction, of high literary art.
- ☞ The best thing about them is that every one of them is a good story well told.
- ☞ They are so well wrought, the plot basis is so admirable, that, apart from one's constant interest in the story, it is a pleasure to see such workmanship. I quite understand why Barrie calls him the novelist's novelist.
- ☞ Some of his short stories resemble O. Henry in the element of surprise and concision.

WEST WIND DRIFT. By George Barr McCutcheon. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

The Inevitable.

At a time when we have learned to look upon marriage as a civil contract and upon divorce as its cancellation it is almost disconcerting to find a novel of the first class based on the idea that marriage is actually an indissoluble union unaffected by decrees or by physical separation. Such is the text on which Mr. Couperus builds his fabric of fiction.

The heroine is Baroness Cornélie de Retz Van Loo, a beautiful young woman who has divorced her decidedly earthy husband. Cornélie leaves her home in The Hague and goes to live in Rome, where she follows her own life free from the censorious tongues of the ultra moral. She becomes a feminist and even writes a pamphlet on "The Social Position of the Divorced Woman."

Then Duco Van der Staal comes on the scene. Duco is a dreamer and a painter, and the two young people drift into a friendship. Cornélie is not artistic, but she has an immense curiosity about art, and Duco, on his part, is curious about the feminist point of view and somewhat disapproving. Friendship soon becomes something warmer, and the author devotes some of his finest chapters to a description of the almost idyllic union of Cornélie and Duco.

But financial stringencies compel the young people to separate. Cornélie takes a position as companion to a wealthy and eccentric old lady in whose drawing-room she meets her former husband, Rudolf Brox. He is just as domineering, just as earthy, as ever, but at once Cornélie begins to feel the old spell. Marriage has meant a mateship between them that divorce can not destroy. She tries to break the spell by returning to Duco, but in her heart she knows that it can not be broken, and so the "inevitable" happens and Cornélie surrenders.

We need not discuss the accuracy of the author's theory. The reader may do that for himself. Nor can there be any discussion of the surprising skill with which the author fills his stage. There is Urania Hope, the daughter of the Chicago manufacturer, who becomes the Princess Forte-Braccio. There is her husband and his father, representative of the ancient Italian aristocracy, and the Marchesa Belloni, who keeps a boarding-house in Rome and spreads her nets for heiresses on a commission basis, and a dozen others. All are distinctive portraits, all playing their part in the development of the central theme, that marriage is indissoluble. The work of translation has been finely done by Mr. Alexander Teixeira de Mattos.

THE INEVITABLE. By Louis Couperus. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $2.

The Age of Innocence.

Readers who are tired of the novel that reforms, that pleads, and that predicts may always turn for relief to Mrs. Wharton, who is content to show us what we are without imploring us to be something different. And with what artistry she does it, with what calm and pitiless satire. The war has swept away the remnants of that exclusive aristocratic New York of the 'seventies that she draws for us. At least we like to say that it has, in spite of some sporadic efforts to revive it. But we remember well the fortress of caste that placidly ignored the human race, following its own amazing ritual of propriety with a portentous solemnity, starving its soul with social formulas, bending in abject obedience to the society hierophants who could loose or bind, admit or exclude, with a handshake or a dinner card. When the Countess Olenska on her return to New York is halted in the twilight zone because of an unfortunate matrimonial adventure it is only necessary that the Van der Luydens of Skuytercliff shall invite her to dinner and the walls of the society Jericho fall before her. Newland Archer, who may be said to be the pitiful little hero of the story, sometimes deviates into the semblance of a human being, occasionally glances over the fence of the society Eden, but he is securely anchored by his wife, who would be a good woman if only she had the faintest conception that she could be anything else, that any other life existed than the life of ceremonialism.

It is well that we should have a record of this amazing aristocracy. It played its part and was submerged by the realities of which it never dreamed. Mrs. Wharton writes of it, not as the curious observer, but as the participant. She portrays the actors and the atmosphere, and she does it with all the faultless skill to which she has accustomed us.

THE AGE OF INNOCENCE. By Edith Wharton. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

The New Decameron.

This is a second volume of stories by various writers, lightly strung together, nearly all of them of the sensational order and among the best of their kind. The only advice that can be given to their clever perpetrators is to get out into the sunshine and into a world of which plot and intrigue are not the main ingredients. There is such a world.

THE NEW DECAMERON. Volume II. New York: Robert M. McBride & Co.

God in the Thickest.

The worship of the god Pan has fallen somewhat into disesteem these later days, but none the less it still has its votaries. Mr. C. E. Lawrence in his quite unusual book tells us of Jan Aylmer, who was driven out of his home town because he derided the music produced by the mayor on his tin whistle. Moreover, the irate people broke the strings of his harp.

And so Jan, lying in the forest and tending his wounds, is visited by the Butterfly people, and one of their number, Daphne, takes a ribbon from her breast and ties it to his harp. But they are inconsequential and frivolous and with the "laughter that is less than happiness" and they go their way. Then come Colin the Wanderer and Dindo, and they make Pan known to him. Pan is a rather terrible god unless he can be charmed into friendliness, and those who deny him, which no wise man will do, are likely to regret it. Pan, says Colin, will never depart from this earth "while there remains a green thicket, a fringed pool, and a woman to be captured. He will never die while girlhood lasts."

The author is to be complimented on a fine and delicate piece of work, as all work must be that opens to us the doors of fairyland.

THE GOD IN THE THICKEST. By G. E. Lawrence. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.

Sweet Rocket.

Mary Johnston has become a mystic, and naturally she finds it hard enough to explain herself to those who are not mystics. She may even be laughed at, but then that is usually the fate of mystics.

"Sweet Rocket" is a rather thin narrative used for the presentation of a philosophy. Richard Linden, who is blind, lives on an old Southern plantation with Marget Land, the daughter of the former overseer. Various friends visit them and the conversation turns constantly to the life behind nature and to the abnormal human faculties by which it may be known. A strong dramatic touch is introduced by the story of the ex-soldier who has a sort of vision while he is lying on the ground wounded and remembers that the dying German by his side was his brother in a former life. It is to be hoped that Miss Johnston will continue to write mystic stories, no matter how the Philistines may smile. She does it better than any other writer now alive.

The average number of locomotives provided annually by the railroads for eight years prior to the war was 2970 (according to the Railway Age). The same authority estimates that the accumulated shortage of the years 1917, 1918, and 1919 was 3190 locomotives. As to this shortage a bulletin of the Association of Railway Executives says: "According to reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission, unofficially summarized on August 30th, the railroads plan the purchase of 1800 locomotives this year at a cost of more than $105,000,000. In the programme for utilization of the $300,000,000 revolving loan fund provided for in the Transportation Act, there are loans to some thirty-two companies, amounting to $29,000,000, to enable them to acquire 636 freight locomotives and 277 switching locomotives, having a total value of approximately $58,000,000. Even if this is a maximum possible programme for increase of motive power at this time, pending the availability of new locomotives more service must be obtained from the locomotives we have. To this end is pledged the effort of every railroad management."

THE NEW BEE

Vernon Kellogg

The heroine of the story, which, as the author says, is intended for all readers from five to fifty, is a bee who rebels against the traditions and customs of the bee-community and insists on knowing things in advance of the proper time. She even dares to love, though only a worker. The story of her adventures is told with a wealth of human interest that makes it as absorbing as though the characters were men and women.

BLASCO IBANEZ' Latest Novel is Now Ready.

THE ENEMIES OF WOMEN

Is there anything stronger than the appeal a woman has for a man?

Blasco Ibanez finds the self-sufficiency of the male routed all along the line. In his Alicia he has concentrated all the resistless fascination of the female of the species as she was found in the old Europe of the pre-war days. But how the lure of sex may in great crises become a regenerator of character is shown in this new volume which does for the war's ideals what "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" did for the war as a conflict of material forces.

THE LATEST BOOKS.

Conventional and Unconventional.

Two novels can be considered together because of the contrast they present to each other, "The Counsel of the Ungodly," by Charles Beckwith, treating of life in the well-established ranks of the socially elect, while "The Broken Laugh," by May Villars, is the story of a humble little London milliner's apprentice who "went wrong," while her heart remained securely and eternally right. The latter book is patently a work in the experimental stage, and the author has not yet mastered the art of economizing her material.

She pours forth heedlessly an unlimited amount of extraneous detail, but she has plainly had ample experience of Continental life, and presents her data vividly enough.

While she is rather too sentimental in her portraiture of "Kissy," the youthful derelict whose misadventures win sympathy instead of condemnation, she unquestionably lends a life-likeness to her pictures of the Parisian "hotel" and the "Madame" who presides over it, as well as its mutually frowzy inmates.

"The Counsel of the Ungodly" calmly deals in the improbable, by changing a ruined but polished worldling into a butler and transforming the daughter of illiteracy and wealth into a polished lady of society. The book is mere froth, but it is gracefully written, the author knowing how to render social atmosphere.

THE COUNSEL OF THE UNGODLY. By Charles Brackett. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

Pengard Awake.

"Pengard Awake" is a new novel with a proud literary ancestry—Du Maurier, R. L. S., the late William De Morgan. If "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" is the first comparison, it is not a lasting one, for Stevenson dwelt on the mystery of dual personality, and as for "Trilby" and "The Martians," well, Du Maurier dwelt on its mysticism. But the new novel on abnormal psychology is reminiscent of De Morgan, both in its theme and in the lovable quality of its characters. Not that "Pengard Awake" is a plagiarism—far from it. It is probably the best thing of the sort since De Morgan, and therefore it recalls him.

It is a relief to read a modern novel whose characters are people, and not types as uninteresting as a sign-post or a museum exhibit—if the novel is "psychological"—and as convincing as tinted paper-dolls if it is intended for a novel of manners. The characters of "Pengard Awake" live and breathe and have their being in the kindly, delicate fancy of Ralph Straus, and their images are directly cast on one's own imagination. No need to memorize tricks, or traits, or names. You know and love Babette, Lucius Arne, Rosamund, and Sir Robert Graeme, with all their faults and foibles.

It is natural that the principal character, John Pengard, alias Hartley Sylvester, really Captain John Mathieson, is the least vivid of all. Mr. Straus' handling of the two personalities caused by Mathieson's split memory is masterly. They are alike and they are not alike. They have a haziness of character in odd contrast to the vivid normal human beings about them—or him. Like Pengard's friends, the reader is constantly trying to focus the unpleasant Hartley and pleasant Pengard as one man. It is baffling.

Despite a heavy scientific ballast that might have overweighted it, "Pengard Awake" is a novel of marked breadth, artistry, and verisimilitude. As in De Morgan's charming "Somehow Good" the scientific treatment of the hero's malady adds to, rather than detracts from, its quality.

A HADEN EXHIBIT.

On Monday next the Print Rooms will place on exhibition a group of etchings of more than ordinary importance. The exhibition will consist of one hundred and twenty etchings, drypoints, and mezzotints by the late Sir Francis Seymour Haden, the collection having the unique distinction of being Haden's personal collection of his own prints, selected and retained by him during his lifetime.

Haden died in 1910 and this group has remained in the possession of his estate until this summer, when it was decided to place them on the market. The Print Rooms entered into competition with the print buyers of London, Paris, and New York, and finally obtained the entire collection, which will be open for public exhibition on Monday, December 13th, for two weeks.

Haden is recognized as one of five immortals of the print world, and together with Durer and Rembrandt, Meryon and Whistler, holds a supreme place in the hearts of the print-loving public. He found painter-etching almost unknown, a vague tradition of the seventeenth century, and it is in a great measure due to him that in his own country the Association of Painter-Etchers has been raised to the dignity of a British Royal Society, the equal in rank of such an institution as the Royal Academy of Art. Instances are not rare of men who, having utterly failed in one career, have afterward succeeded in one totally different. But for a busy surgeon first to achieve eminence in his own profession, and then, comparatively late in life, to take up painter-etching, the most difficult of all the graphic arts, and in it to produce work which ranks him throughout Europe and America as the greatest landscape etcher of all time, is only another proof that genius is not tied down by ordinary limitations.

Admitting that Seymour Haden was a born artist, richly endowed with the creative faculty, how was it that he also became the superb technician that he is? It came to him through long, hard, earnest study and practice. He studied the best models—Rembrandt's etchings above all. But even before he began to form his unsurpassed collection of the old masterpieces it was his custom to borrow a portfolio of such etchings from his favorite London dealer, and carrying home such treasures he would sit up at night with them, not only delighting in their beauty, as other amateurs do, but also studying and analyzing the method and technic of each master. Then, after long practice in drawing, he himself began to etch.

One thinks of Haden as generally out of doors, with copper plate and needle ever ready to hand, for he was essentially an open-air etcher, and the freedom, spontaneity, and breadth of his draftsmanship are as characteristic of him as the certainty of his touch and the variety of his line. Without being original in the sense that Rembrandt and Whistler, his young brother-in-law, were original, Haden's personality was so strong that it stamped itself upon his plates. It must have been exceedingly difficult at a time when Whistler had done his immortal Thames etchings for an artist of lesser originality, albeit a master, to etch the charming "Harry Kelley's" and yet remain entirely himself. Greater still is his achievement in the noble "Breaking Up of the Agamemnon," with its splendid sky, one of the finest down-river etchings ever done. But the countryside was Haden's happiest etching ground, and he was never so easy as when drawing trees or river banks where trees and rushes grow, since, like Turner, he loved nature. One sees his delight in water with reflected shadows in the charming "Water Meadow" with its rainy sky, a plate that Haden himself confessed to liking, "which," he added, "was saying a great deal"; also in the serenely beautiful "Sunset in Ireland," with the drypoint's tone of richness and mystery of the large "Shere Mill Pond"; and in the attractively sketched little "Kilgaren Castle," and in that happy piece of drypoint, "The Little Boathouse."

It is a distinct triumph for San Francisco that this deservedly world-famous collection of etchings has been procured for this community, and is but another evidence of the determination on the part of her citizens to make San Francisco a real art centre, gathering here examples of the supreme art of all periods and places.

Postage Wasted.

There is one source of revenue to the government of which but few persons are aware—that proceeding from the large number of stamps that are wasted by the people.

There are two ways in which the government profits by the carelessness and ignorance of the public. In the first place many stamps are destroyed. This means a profit to the Postoffice Department of many thousands of dollars a year; how much can not be estimated, for there is no means of getting figures, except by elaborate and untrustworthy calculation. A person carries stamps in his pockets until they are so worn that he does not dare to use them. In point of fact anything that looks like a good stamp, no matter if it is somewhat mutilated, is passed by the clerks, just as a dilapidated bank note is good if there is enough of it to show what it is. Wear and dirt can not, without almost destroying the stamp, give it the look of one that has been canceled. Yet few persons will put a damaged stamp on a letter. Besides, many stamps are lost or destroyed entirely and the government makes a clear gain.

The other source of loss to the individual by which the government profits is the number of stamps that are wasted in excess postage. People who have not a five-cent stamp put three two-cent stamps on foreign letters, thus making the Postoffice Department a present of 1 cent. Domestic mail, too, is frequently overstamp. Enough money is wasted in this way to provide thousands of inexpensive letter scales.

Moreover, few persons know anything about the rates for newspapers and think that because a newspaper rolls into such a solid bundle it costs a great deal to send. So they go on overpaying the postage.

On the other hand much matter is underpaid. Here the government loses nothing, for the shortage is collected from the receiver, who must pay the due stamp. Knowing this, and being anxious not to seem niggardly to the friend who must make up any deficiency in postage, a person in doubt often puts on too many stamps—and Uncle Sam gets the difference.

Scientists report that the small boy is the only animal which does not like a bath. But this is unjust. The small boy does like a bath, provided there is not too much regulation going with it. He likes his bath only in the summertime, in the cool waters of a still running brook, without any supervision or soap. Other animals have similar preferences equally peculiar and unworthy. Pigs like baths of thin mud. Cats like dry rubs, using their tongues as rough Turkish towels. Long-haired dogs have a weakness for plunges into deep lakes, and then for bringing as much of the lake as they can up to the crowd and shaking it generously over the picnic dinner. So why pick on the small boy?

GIANTS, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

When Johann Van Albert stepped from the gangplank on a recent arrival of the Mauretania he had the distinction of being the tallest man who ever entered the United States. His 8 feet 5 inches of height required that a special berth, made up of two cots placed end to end in a large companionway, be furnished for the trip from his home in Amsterdam, Holland.

Since Johan has left his quiet home out among the nearby windmills of Amsterdam and intends to enter the show business over here, it will be interesting to dig up some giant history and see how he compares with previous competitors who used to be great attractions. Probably no living giant in the United States ever exceeded the 8 feet attained by the late Captain Bates, who was a native of Kentucky.

The word "living" is used here because of the fact that for some time during the year 1869 the famous Cardiff giant led many people to believe that a 10-foot man had once lived and was buried near Cardiff, a village in Onondaga County, New York. The story of this monstrous fraud perpetrated on the American public makes such unusual and interesting reading that it will bear repeating.

The idea had its inception out in Fort Dodge, Iowa, when an adventurous fakir purchased a huge block of gypsum from a quarryman of that place. The block then was shipped to Chicago, it being taken in charge by a sculptor, who chiseled it into a 10-foot giant. The surface was pricked with needles to give the appearance of pores in the human skin, and then treated with a variety of acids which made the entire statue appear of ancient origin. After completion the giant was securely packed in an iron box and shipped to Union, New York, where the owner claimed it, loaded the hulky box upon a large wagon, and hauled it fifty miles to a farm near Cardiff. The giant form was then removed from the box and secretly buried, remaining under the ground nearly a year, until it was "accidentally" discovered by some workmen who had been engaged to dig a well by the promoter of the fraud.

This great discovery was made on October 16, 1869, and news of the wonderful petrified giant spread all over the country. The lucky finders covered it with a tent and put it on exhibition, while special trains were run from New York City and other nearby points so that the clamoring multitudes could see the astonishing remains at the earliest opportunity.

Until the deception was discovered it is estimated that more than 50,000 persons jostled each other in order to view the wonder, paying a dollar apiece for the remarkable privilege.

But, passing on from this greatest hoax, it is found that Captain Bates was the tallest of our modern American giants, although his 8-foot height was slightly exceeded by that of Anna Swan, a native of Nova Scotia. Going further back into giant history we find that Queen Elizabeth's head porter was 7 feet 6 inches high, probably being given this exalted position on account of his ability to see what was going on at all times.

Among royalty itself it is claimed that one of the Roman emperors was nearly nine feet high, but the measurements of those days may have allowed him considerable more height than he would be entitled to at this time, though no doubt he was a person of great stature for history to make note of the fact.

Federal prohibition authorities in Philadelphia say that the square brown whisky bottle formerly filled with the product manufactured by a Baltimore distillery are selling today for $1.50 each, empty. Two years ago a pint bottle filled with that well-known brand sold for the same price. A like condition is true of another familiar bottle of the now historic gin species which two years ago cost for the bottle and its contents what the empty bottle is selling for in the market today.

THE BAINSFATHER LECTURE.

English and Colonial accents were heard on all sides at the Bairnsfather lecture last Thursday night, when Captain Bruce Bairnsfather, nearing the end of his six months' lecture tour, gave his one San Francisco talk. I call it a talk preferably because of its delightful informality, the speaker indulging in no set discourse, but talking on with pleasant ease and deliciously casual humor, telling the story of his early art ambitions, the usual fate which attends the early struggles of the ambitious artist, that of being obliged to earn his living in other ways, and finally the modest beginnings of his fame in war-time, when the inspiring word was passed along that there was a man in the trenches drawing pictures that made the mud-plastered, water-soaked, shell-hombarde British Tommies laugh.

This was the real beginnings of Bairnsfather's fame, for the world hungered for details of trench life then as keenly as it now turns away from them.

The speaker threw upon a screen many of his cartoons, and we began to realize that America knew well only a few of them, for it was the British and the Colonials who learned to look eagerly each week for those wonderful cartoons that told the tragic tale with such abounding humor that the war-saddened Britons re-learned to laugh.

Captain Bairnsfather is a man of most attractive personality. Without any pretension he tells his experiences, his discourse interlarded with quiet-seeming little jokes that penetrate the most resistant hide, starting up waves of laughter all over the house. He told circumstances in connection with each picture thrown upon the screen, to such effect that their delightful, permeating humor was enhanced, and the amused auditors, after their first burst, laughed all over again with fresh zest.

It was curious to observe in his pictures the mingling of humor drama: for they gave faithful reflections of places and events, the infallible skill and exuberant humor of the artist placing his subjects in positions of the greatest peril so ludicrously that while the people at home could but laugh they learned much of what the life of the trenches was like.

Mr. Bairnsfather used his facile pencil to point a few truths home into the composite skull of the war office, and in more ways than one was a friend to the brave martyrs in the hideous trenches.

At the conclusion of his talk the artist did about four sketches in chalk, thus affording us an objective demonstration of his method of attaining his remarkably graphic effects; for his lights and shadows, the diverging aura that attends a soaring shell, the mess characteristic of real war, and the thick, dramatic murk of the battlefield are all indicated as a setting to the ludicrousness of his delightfully comical tommies by the hand of a master at the craft.

"RUTHERFORD & SON."

This play of Githa Sowerby's ranks with Stanley Houghton's "Hindle Wakes," both of them treating with tense realism the family atmosphere generated by a domestic despot. In "Hindle Wakes," however, the mill master, old Jeffcote, is of very different fibre from Rutherford Senior, for Jeffcote has a stern and unswerving conscience, while old Rutherford allows himself to twist every will, every purpose, and every motive to his one absorbing idea: that of maintaining the prestige of the Rutherford business.

The play is a remarkable one, in that it shows the workings of an inexorable will, the devastating effect it has on human lives, and the fate that more often than not attends these domestic despots, who are apt to find themselves, their world entirely subjugated, alone.

Thus it was with Rutherford Senior, for all the young generation of his house, their lives broken and their hearts full of hate for the family autocrat, left him lord of a desolate hearthstone, but a conqueror.

A play of such serious purpose, unrelieved by any lighter element—which really would be an intrusion—can never win its way with the great, light-minded public, but all true lovers of the drama can not fail to be profoundly interested in this play, partly because of the still intensity with which the theme is treated and partly because the author has so admirably conveyed the boding atmosphere of an interior in which family intercourse transpires over a volcanic crater.

Githa Sowerby was a young woman, scarcely out of girlhood, when this play first appeared, eight or ten years ago. Her literary feat almost if not quite parallels that of Emily Bonnté in the latter's authorship of "Wuthering Heights." Both of these works were written by observant young women who were struck by the drama inherent in the lives of those dour north of England men whose natures are moulded into sternness and sombreness by the deadly climate.

Both works, naturally, have faults; and yet one almost hesitates to characterize as a fault the lack of action in "Rutherford & Son" because of the white-hot intensity of emotion underlying those long interviews between the various members of Rutherford's sternly regulated household, in which are revealed natures whose severe repression makes for storm and stress. It reminds us of the old New England types, now passing away under the influence of the national cheerful modernism.

Mr. Maitland and his company gave a particularly interesting performance, the characters that stand out being those of old and young Rutherford in the hands of Messrs. Maitland and Smythe, and that of the daughter Janet, whose forced submission and inner revolt was quite strikingly indicated by Mary Morris, who, by the marked contrast of her last two particularly successful impersonations, has very thoroughly demonstrated that she is an actress of parts. There was real subtlety in some of the finer points made by the young actress, and subtlety on the stage is a precious quality.

Mr. Smythe, as usual, was thoroughly in the character. This young man never falls into monotony, but by the expressive flexibility of his tone and utterance he showed all the follies and weaknesses and feeble, futile moods of the despot's emasculated son.

Mr. Maitland adhered to the harsh, driving tone of the family autocrat whose decisions are immutable, and although his type of countenance can scarcely be modeled into the physiognomy of rough-hewn granite that we conceive appropriate to such a man, he made the character thoroughly consistent, and he must be complimented also for his success in making the general presentation of the play conform to the idea of the author.

For every character was carefully and consistently presented. The sad seriousness of Bert Horton's young churchman, the gentle positiveness of Grace MacKerrich's old-fashioned Aunt Ann, the faintly repressed emotionalism of the discouraged young wife, as indicated by Audra Due, the mingling of servility and alcoholic defiance in Caroline Howard's spirituously soaked drah, and the devoted humility of Martin's submissive service, which was so aptly conveyed by William Augustine, all were instrumental in making us properly acquainted with one more of the many masterpieces that, were it not for Mr. Maitland's courageous enterprise, we would never see on the local stage.

A DOUBLE CONCERT.

The Hackett-Vidas concert given last Sunday under Mr. Healy's management was, musically, an event. Each artist gave a recital generous in quantity and exquisite in quality. It was something of a novelty to see these two young men coming forward, in turn, each giving of his best as if for the supreme delight of giving vent to his artistic impulse: for the audience was so warmly receptive and so lavish in its acclaim that the two artists vied with each other in the generosity of their response. Thus the concert was so augmented that it became a veritable banquet of music.

Raoul Vidas headed the programme with Corelli's "Folies d'Espagne," a piece well fitted to display the youth's technical ability. This was followed by a varied programme in which the grave, dignified young artist showed a wealth of virtuosity beyond his years.

An artist of his youth has not yet entered into his full heritage of temperamental warmth and depth, but although Mr. Vidas holds himself, by virtue of a serene, well-poised dignity, in a certain restraint, he plays, in some respects, with the power and technical versatility of a man eight or ten years his senior. At present he makes his hearers admire rather than feel deeply his tastes, indeed, impelling him toward compositions that make for technical display. Thus he gave a Wieniawski "Caprice," "Perpetual Motion," the Pugnani-Kreisler "Prelude and Allegro," and the Saint-Saëns "A Major Concerto."

Not yet has the tone, beautiful though it is, of the young player attained to the supreme excellence which it is easy to foresee. But for an artist of his youth Mr. Vidas gave a remarkable exhibition of technical mastery, while he has also developed an individuality of style that after a few years will attain to greater richness of growth.

It is curious how rarely American artists show in their physiognomy their temperamental leanings toward art as do the Europeans. One would suppose, in looking upon Mr. Charles Hackett's cheerful and pleasant countenance, that he was merely an everyday young man, perhaps a genial stockbroker or a bank clerk; whereas this American tenor sings like an artist and renders the diction of his songs like a poet. He has a voice that, in its more emotional passages, attains to real splendor. How superb it would sound soaring among the arches of a great cathedral!

Pure tenor in quality, with those silver notes that move the listener to enthusiasm. Yet there is a fine sonority to Mr. Hackett's voice that, generally, one finds only in the voices of the greatest tenors.

This singer is rich in the qualities that make for excellence: remarkable breath control, which enables him to give beautiful emotional coloring to his tones; an amplitude and elevation of sentiment expressed in the more dramatic passages that fairly thrills his hearers; while in songs of gentler and tenderer feeling the singer, hushing his voice to a sensitively attuned loveliness of tone, renders to a charm the refined and lovely sentiment of such numbers as Da Rosa's "Star Vicino," Handel's "O Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me," or Ansgore's "In the Forest."

As a graceful compliment to his gifted and most sympathetic accompanist, Mr. Seneca Pierce, Mr. Hackett sang "My Little House," a tender and appealing composition by the young pianist, who, in spite of his fine ability as a player, is apparently of a youth to match Raoul Vidas.

THE ORPHEUM.

We found ourselves, at the beginning of the Orpheum programme this week, hanging with fascinated eyes and ears upon one of the neatest, deftest, most dextrous series of juggling tricks that we have ever seen at the popular vaudeville house. With amazing skill and rapidity the Royal Gascoigne tossed such things in the air as a knife, a fork, and a turnip, impaling the turnip with fascinating ease, and rolling heavy halls all over his anatomy. Bertha, the dog, a melancholy little canine Hamlet, wasn't in it with the man, who kept up a running commentary of amusing nonsense which showed genuine, spontaneous humor. Bertha's trick consisted of being tossed in the air and coming down on her forefeet, but she was so hopelessly dejected that I am afraid our fascinating friend is not so tender to the blonde libel Bertha as his fond kisses would seem to im-

"The Story of a Fortunate Youth"

By JEAN KENYON MACKENZIE

The early experiences of a delightful young Scot, before and after coming to America at the age of nineteen, are recounted in this little book by his daughter with the charm and sympathy which make the best biographical writing what it is. Many readers of the Atlantic will recall these "Chapters from the Biography of an Elderly Gentleman" with genuine pleasure. They chronicle a piece of "Americanization" of the most heartening and fruitful kind. "A book for every girl to give her father." The many friends of Dr. Robert Mackenzie, formerly pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, will be especially interested in this little volume, which has a Scotch plaid cover. It is really the story of her father.

ply. Bertha was altogether cut out later by a perky little Boston terrier who lighted up the clever act of the Garcinetti hat throwers by his lively fun, and the frenzied delight with which he took part in the hall game.

There are two playlets on the bill this week, one, "The Magic Glasses," presented in the shape of rhymed couplets which, by the way, go with a decided limp. The actors, however, speak them very well, and the piece holds the audience. The idea is probably borrowed from "Eyes of Youth" as "the magic glasses" show the two possible destinies awaiting a girl according to which one of her two suitors she chooses.

The other and very gauzy play is by Rupert

Potrero Heights Reservoir

"East of Harrison Street is the Potrero Nuevo, extending from Division Street on the north to Islais Creek on the south. South of Islais Creek is the Potrero Viejo, commonly called South San Francisco."—Zoeth S. Eldredge.

Potrero Heights Reservoir, situated at Twenty-Second and Carolina Streets, south of the San Francisco Hospital, was excavated in the rock in 1897.

At an elevation of 315 feet above sea level it receives water by gravity from Laguna Honda, which is 370 feet high, and its function is to supply, at good pressure, those consumers who dwell in the hilly section of the Potrero.

Adjoining this reservoir there is a wooden tank, at an elevation of 357 feet, which is filled by pumping, and from which consumers at the crest of the heights are supplied.

Potrero Heights Reservoir has a capacity of one million gallons.

It does for Potrero Heights what Lomhard and Francisco Reservoirs do for Telegraph Hill and Pacific Heights, solving the problem of good water service for hill-dwellers.

In 1844 the Potrero de San Francisco was granted to Francisco and Ramon de Haro, twin sons of Francisco de Haro. These young men with their uncle, José Reyes Beryessa, were killed at San Rafael by Kit Carson and other followers of Fremont during the Bear Flag excitement in June, 1846. Their bodies lie in Mission Dolores Cemetery.

Hughes, but is not particularly to the credit of the author, as its success is made much more by the terrific energy of William Gaxton, the chief player, than by the merit of the play.

Laurel Lee is an exceedingly pretty little fascinator with the biggest, most coquettish of curls, the darkest and most luxuriant of curls, and a perfect little shape. Laurel, however, was principally engaged in playing off her prettiness on the audience; in exhibiting her soft, white curves, her pretty French lisp, and other charms; but in spite of her indubitable beauty and piquancy, her act was a little empty, and the audience rather languid in its applause; for vaudeville audiences are sophisticated and want some meat to an act.

The Cameron Sisters are two pretty high kickers who give a good dancing act, with several changes of costume, and Bigelow and Clinton are two rather uninteresting young men who make various weird noises that are presumably funny.

The act that "goes big" is Mme. Doree's "operadialogue," in which eight or nine operatic singers with astonishingly good voices render solos and concerted numbers from "Rigoletto,"

"Faust," "Lucia," "Tales of Hoffman," "Romeo and Juliet," and "La Traviata." The singers are well trained, and each number is presented as an operatic scene, with sets, costumes, and all.

It is an excellent idea, and I should say that Mme. Doree, the competent lady who runs the act and presides at the piano, offering a brief but enlightening commentary for the benefit of the uninformed before each scene, has a very level head. I think, though, that she might correct Marguerite's headgear and repress the exuberances of La Traviata's costume and tresses. But both generally and concretely the act is an extremely good one, and worthy only of praise.

An interesting feature of the programme is a remarkably fine series of views in which various aspects of the Niagara Falls are presented. The pictures are really superb, and it is safe to say that any one who has seen them has a better idea of the falls than can be gained during the brief stoppage of the train when travelers are passing that way.

The Alcazar Theatre.

"Watch My Smoke," to be given its premiere at the Alcazar Theatre the week starting Sunday matinee, is the second successful play produced by Walter A. Rivers. Rivers is the author of "Clean Hands," a drama of present-day politics, purchased recently by a New York theatrical producer for presentation next season. "Watch My Smoke" concerns the adventures of David Hamilton, a "wage slayer" who feels the impulse to be more than that. He gets a little "nest egg" unexpectedly and proceeds to revolutionize the business of his "boss." The vim with which he asserts himself in the interests of his employer precipitates an avalanche of comedy situations involving a deceitful nephew of the boss, a big deal to control a valuable oil property, and a budding romance that has its beginning in a New York boarding-house. This appealing comedy-drama, as human as life itself, will afford Dudley Ayres one of the best acting roles he has had in a long while. Miss Elwyn Harvey likewise will find exceptional opportunities. All the Alcazar favorites, including Ben Erway, Charles Yule, Rafael Brunetto, Edna Peckham, Al Cunningham, Henry Shumer, Walter Emerson, Fred Green, Edith Searles, Walter Belasco, and others have been fitted with congenial roles.

In preparation for December 19th is the Christmas play of laughter, pathos, and melody, "The Things That Count," in which Alice Brady scored a great success for seven months at William A. Brady's New York Playhouse.

The Orpheum.

Victor Moore and Emma Littlefield are to be at the Orpheum next week. Their offering is a revival of their famous back-stage skit, "Change Your Act or Back to the Woods."

"Hello, Husband," a satirical comedy dealing with the somewhat prevalent domestic idea that the average husband requires an introduction to his wife, will be another of next week's laugh provokers. "Hello, Husband" is played by Lulu McGuire and Hamilton Christy.

"Likable Lads Loaded with Laughs" is the alliterative way in which Ole Olsen and Chic Johnson describe themselves and the act which they will contribute to next week's bill. They are said to furnish a fine example of clean clownery and to offer a choice blend of piano and song.

Jack Le Vier, combination monologist and trapeze performer, will entertain with his twin accomplishments.

Thomas and Gertrude Kennedy, formerly feature dancers of Weber and Fields All-Star Jubilee, will give an example of their dancing prowess in a few of their own creations.

Original presentation of original songs will characterize the act of Irving Goslar and Rhea Lusby. They term their offering "Artistic Bits of Vaudeville." The special songs in this number were written by Goslar.

Petty Reat and Brother, "assisted by twenty li'l bottles," to quote their own descriptive phrase, will play difficult musical selections on ordinary bottles.

Mme. Doree's Operadialogue, presenting the most famous of the "Operatic Sweethearts," will remain another seven days.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"When We Dead Awaken," by Henrik Ibsen, is to be produced for the first time in San Francisco this coming week at the Maitland Playhouse. The play does not, as the title might indicate, spell a spiritual awakening, but rather an awakening within our own bodies of a better life in this world. Ibsen is said to be at his best in this work, and Director Arthur Maitland is enthusiastic over the possibilities for dramatic art that are contained in the play.

"Rutherford & Son," by Githa Sowerby, said to be one of the best written plays of the present century, is on the boards this week and will conclude with the performance this coming Saturday night.

Child Players

Talma-Zetta Wilbur will present eleven clever children in two delightful one-act plays this Saturday evening, December 11th, 1920, at Sorois Hall.

"The Bravest Thing in the World," by Lee Pape, will be played by Master Bernard J. Ward, Jr., Little Kay Scanlon, and Little Eva Datson, assisted by Harriette Murton, Lela Trippett Ball, and Lewis White.

"A Child's Play for Grown-Ups" was especially written for Talma-Zetta Wilbur by Mrs. L. C. Hunter of Sacramento. It will be interpreted by Thelma Petersen, Bertha Joseph, Eleanor MacKericher, Amy Fox, Helen Morris, Alice Sullivan, Lois Pannell, Maraget Hammond, George Murton, George Saunders, and Bernard J. Ward, Jr.

The Senior Dramatic Club will appear in the charming little comedy, "In the Spring a Young Man's Fancy," by Will Smith Ranson, and those appearing will be the maids: Eunice Woolsey, Genevieve Hesketh, Harriette Murton, Bille Andre, June Day, Helen Argens, Dorothy Saunders; the young man: Lewis White.

The Curran Theatre.

The Curran Theatre will have a lively attraction for the week beginning Sunday night, when A. H. Woods will present his biggest success, "The Girl in the Limousine." It enjoyed a run of over eight months in New York, four months in Chicago, and an equally prosperous engagement in Boston. The authors are Wilson Collison and Avery Hopwood, the former of whom gained much popularity and lucre as the co-author of "Up in Mabel's Room," while Avery Hopwood not only has many other successes to his credit, but he is especially conspicuous at the present time through having four successful plays running at the same time in New York theatres.

The play is in three acts and deals largely with misadventures of Tony Hamilton, a society man who, while on his way to a house party, meets with an accident, is robbed by a couple of thugs of his money and other valuables, not the least of which are his clothes. It happens to be a stormy night and the robbers in a moment of kindly impulse carry him into the house where the party was to be given and deposit him in the bedroom of the hostess.

Mr. Woods, as usual, has furnished a selected company of farceurs for the production. It includes among others John Arthur, who distinguished himself with the Eastern star cast in "Up in Mabel's Room," "Parlor, Bedroom, and Bath," "Fair and Warmer," and other farce successes; Nancy Fair, William Halligan, Marion Ballou, George B. Connor, Barnett Parker, Archer Curtis, Anne Lorenz, Jane Seymour, Edward Butler, Lee Kelso.

The Columbia Theater.

Kolb & Dill are to be at the Columbia Theatre for two weeks, starting Monday, with "The High Cost of Loving" as their vehicle. From the first to the last curtain "The High Cost of Loving" abounds in just the right sort of lines and situations to give the two stars their best chance for merrymaking. The show

"Pomander Walk," that charming play written by Louis Napoleon Rucker, an American playwright, is to be given at the Maitland Playhouse commencing the week of December 27th. It is particularly appropriate to the holiday season and is to be given in response to the request of many who weekly attend the performances of the Stockton Street house. VANITY FAIR.

It is seldom safe to draw comparisons between ancient and modern times to the detriment of the manners of today. Two can play at that game, if we may be allowed to borrow from the idiom of the street. If some one tells us in the regular maiden aunt manner that this, that, or the other was never done when he was young, it may usually be found that a good many other things were never done when he was young, although they ought to have been done, and that a good many things were done when he was young that ought not to have been done then or at any other time. It is so fatally easy to select a few petty examples of retrogression, to rip them from their social context, and to display them as evidence of the speed with which we are all going to the demitition bow-wows. Perhaps that is in very truth our destination, but we must have some stronger proof than the reminiscences of our aunts and our grandmothers, who are naturally prone to exalt the eras which they happen to have decorated with so many charming proprieties.

Now we have the highest respect for President Eliot, who is in no way addicted to those ruminations of our maiden aunts upon the narrow path that bore the impress of their youthful feet in contrast with the broad road that is supposed to be leading the present generation to destruction. None the less President Eliot seems to think that we are decadent. The men of his youthful days would never have smoked in the presence of women. Delicacy would have forbidden such an outrage upon the proprieties.

Now it may be that President Eliot is right. Autres temps, autres mœurs. He was born about eighty-six years ago and we have quite an assortment of the fictional literature that represented the manners of that day. And the manners were not very nice. There were plenty of bowings and scrapings and pretty speeches, but there is very little evidence that women inspired any better respect. Indeed they inspire much more real respect today. It may be that men did not smoke in the presence of women, but they had no hesitation in getting drunk and in allowing women to know that they got drunk. It seems to have been no great breach of good manners to arrive drunk in the drawing-room after dinner, and indeed such a thing must have been quite ordinary and unremarked. Many of the novels of those days would lead us to suppose that the young woman was perpetually the object of the chase and was usually supposed to have been created for that purpose. She seems to have thought so herself. She was forever swooning and fainting because of supposed assaults upon her virtue. It was always a case of "the villain still pursued her," and it must be admitted that sometimes she did not run so very fast in her efforts to escape him. She was quite often caught. No, it can not be admitted that we are less chivalrous than were our grandfathers or that the status of women has in any way fallen since the dear old gentlemen drank their health in such generous measure that they were unable to stand steady in their presence.

President Eliot must surely remember the day when married women were not allowed to own property. The man who would on no account smoke in the presence of a woman had no hesitation in gracefully denying her the rights of a human being. The woman of that day would probably have put up quite willingly with a whiff of tobacco smoke if at the same time she had been allowed to own what belonged to her. The effort to give married women the right to own property was defeated on the ground that "to give women such a right would bring them into contact with the roughest scenes of life, would destroy their sensibilities, weaken their dependence on man, and thereby take away one of the loveliest of their charms." The refusal, it will be noticed, is gracefully worded, a reflex of the "delicacy" of that day. But perhaps the women would have preferred a little less delicacy and a little more justice.

Rupert Hughes, writing to a New York newspaper, tells us that the Puritan maidens used to smoke and that some of our grandmothers did the same. "Some of our young women," says Mr. Hughes, "reveal their pretty bodies very generously, to the benefit of their health and the dismay of idiotic prudery. . . . Let no one pretend with impunity that the sickly mockery of so-called civility indicated greater reverence than the high freedoms of today."

A Paris dispatch to the New York Tribune says that the great difficulty in finding lodgings in Paris has been the cause of many unusual incidents recently.

Divorced persons seeking separate apartments are having such difficulty in finding them that, in one case at least, they composed their temperamental differences in order to keep their old apartment.

A painter and his wife who had been divorced by mutual agreement were both looking for apartments. Frequently their paths crossed in their search for quarters. The first time they met they bowed gravely, but politely. Their mutual smile gradually broadened as the hunt for flats narrowed down to a few hovels in the slum section.

"Let's kiss and make up and go back to our flat," the wife finally said; and they did.

President Millerand, who recently took possession of the Elysée Palace, received forty-one applications for his apartment on the Avenue de Villars.

Henri Landru, who has been in La Santé Prison for the past twenty months awaiting trial on charges growing out of the disappearance of eleven women, recently was dispossessed from the flat that he had occupied on the Boulevard Rochechouart, a rather sordid section of Paris. Requests came from every quarter in Paris, some even from aristocratic Auteuil, asking that the flat be reserved.

A vagrant just finishing thirty days in La Santé Prison told his cellmate, under sentence of five years for swindling, that he dreaded to return to cold, dreary Paris. He was homeless, and the prospect of spending the winter nights under Paris bridges did not appeal to him. The prisoners exchanged clothing and cards of identity, and when the warder called for the vagrant to send him out into the cold world the swindler responded. The fraud was discovered only when the swindler's lawyer called at the jail.

Wholesale jewelry sales in the John Street and Maiden Lane District approximated $180,000,000 in the last year (according to an article by Samuel Conover, president of the Fidelity-International Trust Company, in the Jeweler's Circular). Of these sales about $100,000,000 were in precious stones, $35,000,000 in gold ornaments, settings, and plate; $15,000,000 each in optical goods, silver and silver-plated wares, and platinum.

Jewelry comes third in the list of annual sales in the district south of Brooklyn Bridge and east of Broadway, according to Mr. Conover.

Pipe smoking seems to be on the increase among London women, and fashionable cigar stores display dainty small briars, some set with precious stones (according to the London correspondent of the New York Tribune). It is said there is a growing demand for these.

At one West London theatre where smoking is permitted two smartly dressed women were seen the other evening in a box puffing at their jeweled pipes, and soon an old Irish woman in the gallery followed suit. Hers was a clay "cutty."

In a first-class railroad car between Hordsham and London a quarrel arose the other day between a number of non-smoking women and another woman who refused to put out her cigarette at her sister travelers' behest. It ended in one of the anti-smokers seizing the offending cigarette, gold-mounted tortoiseshell holder and all, and flinging it out of the window.

"Two guineas and costs will meet the case," said the magistrate.

A striking feature of the parade of Confederate veterans in their reunion at Houston, Texas, was several floats depicting the Ku-Klux Klan, which struck terror to negroes and white carpetbaggers in the South immediately after the civil war.

MARVELS OF BIRD LIFE.

In a recent interview Dr. Frank M. Chapman, curator of the department of birds of the American Museum of Natural History in New York City and organizer and leader of a number of South American expeditions, gave some interesting information concerning South American bird life.

Costa Rica, he said, is about the same size as West Virginia, but over 650 species of land birds have been found in that little Central American republic, whereas in all America north of Mexico only some 500 species are known.

The figures give us some conception of the wealth of South American bird life, and, when we enter the Andean region, where mountains with their feet in the tropics rear their heads far above the limits of perpetual snow, the resulting abrupt climatic changes due to altitude bring within an even smaller area a larger number of birds than has been recorded from Costa Rica. In Andean Colombia, for example, the museum expeditions actually secured specimens of over 1150 species of land birds, or more than twice as many as exist in the United States, Canada, and Greenland.

This teeming bird population is due, not only to highly diversified and favorable climatic conditions, but also to the fact that in tropical South America birds are practically non-migratory. They are, therefore, continuously subjected to the influences of their surroundings and do not mix with birds from other localities; two factors of the utmost importance in the evolution of species.

But the richness of South American bird life is due to the presence of the Andes more than to any other one thing; and it is the absence of great mountain chains in Africa which accounts for the comparatively small numbers of species of birds in that continent. From base to summit, four distinct zones of life—tropical, sub-tropical, temperate, and alpine—are found in the higher Andes, and each zone has species which are confined to it. So sharply are these zones defined that, where the slope is steep, one may pass from one zone to another on foot in less than ten minutes and, at the same, find an almost entirely different set of birds.

Such changes are impossible at sea level. One may go from the tropical upper Amazon 3000 miles to its mouth and find less difference in the general bird population than one will encounter in an altitude of 3000 feet in the Andes.

It is not only the height of the Andes which affects bird life. In places for hundreds of miles this gigantic range may appear as two or three chains, each not less than 10,000 or 11,000 feet in height, and these climatic walls are as impassable to the species living in the tropical or sub-tropical valleys they enclose as though they extended to the zenith. Isolation is, therefore, added to the factors of climate and sedentariness in the making of the species, and the three combined have produced a greater variety of bird life than is found in any area of similar extent in the world. This circumstance alone would make the Andean region especially attractive to naturalists, but of even more importance than the abounding life is the fact that much of this life has evidently been evolved in comparatively recent years. There is, therefore, far greater possibility of determining the causes which govern the origin and distribution of life in such a region than in one where no climatic or other environmental changes have occurred in recent geologic times, and where evolution has, as it were, been at a standstill.

The last mill—the last firm—that had a part in feeding the colonial armies has just discontinued business, ending the career of what probably is the oldest corporation in this country that has been conducted continuously by the same family. The Lea Milling Company of Wilmington, Delaware, co-operated closely with Washington, who considered the mills of such strategic importance that he ordered the owners to dismantle the burrs and hide the upper stones from the British army. So these great stones, weighing more than a ton each, were carried in ox carts to remote places, out of reach of the Hessians, and buried. Due to the good memory of a Continental officer, one of these was found later, but the other still lies hidden. It was at the Brandywine mills that flour and grain reached the highest figure for which they were ever sold in the United States. Old records show that $24 a bushel was paid for wheat, and that between 300 and 400 barrels of flour brought the gross sum of $21,000. This happened in 1780.

Theodore Roosevelt once predicted that Alaska would, within a century, support as large a population as the entire Scandinavian Peninsula, that Alaska with its enormous resources of mineral and great fisheries would produce as hardy and vigorous a race as any part of America.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

At the Hollywood summer school the other day the teacher asked one little chap what his name was. "Jule," was the quick response. "Don't say Jule; say Julius," corrected the teacher, and then passed on to the next tot. "What's your name?" she asked. "Bilious," was the disconcerting answer.

"It is not always necessary to make a direct accusation," remarked Lou Guernsey, who was asking damages in behalf of a client because of insinuations damaging his good name. "You men have heard of the woman who called to the maid servant: 'Mary, Mary, come here and take the parrot downstairs—the master has dropped his collar stud.'"

Somebody asked Al Waddell what was the saddest thing he saw during the war. "Well, it was this way," said Al. "We had just discovered a machine-gun nest with about twelve gunners in it who were holding the advance of our troops. We located the nest and our first shot went right into the centre of it." "How dreadful!" cried the old lady. "Did it kill them all?" "No," said Al sadly; "it was a dud."

The case before the court was one involving the ownership of a tract of land and the attorney for one of the parties was cross-examining a witness. "Now, Mr. Grimshaw, the property on which you live was originally a part of the twenty acres under dispute, was it not?" "Yes, sir." "And your title is based on the original title to the land, I presume?" "Yes, sir." "How long have you resided there?" "Over twenty-one years." "Have you had—now mark me—have you had twenty-one years' undisputed possession of that property?" The witness hesitated for a moment. "Remember, Mr. Grimshaw," said the lawyer, raising his voice, "that you are under oath. Have you had twenty-one years' undisputed possession of that property?" "It has been disputed once, and only once," answered the witness. "I found a nest of bumblebees in my back yard one day last summer." In the general laugh that followed this answer the lawyer subsided.

Booth Tarkington, the novelist, was talking about American village life. "I'm afraid our American villages," he said, "don't practice the social amenities to any great extent. I know a short-story writer who moved recently into a quaint Vermont village. I met him the other day in a magazine office and asked him how he liked his new life. 'Fair,' he answered. 'Have you called on your neighbors yet?' said I. 'No,' said he. 'But I'm going to if I miss any more of my wood.'"

General Palmer Pierce told a war story at a dinner in Washington. "A middle-aged chap volunteered," he said, "and the first day in 'the trenches was a thing to see. No veteran ever conducted himself more coolly or more cheerfully under fire. 'It's wonderful how that new chap Smithers settles down to it,' said a captain. 'Ah, captain,' said a corporal, 'if you knew poor Bill Smithers' home life as I do you'd realize how he appreciates a quiet day among the shells.'"

An amusing incident occurred at a living bridge tournament held recently in Pasadena. The young woman who was impersonating the Queen of Hearts was accosted in the middle of the game by a guest of the Maryland, who lisped sweetly: "I'm looking for the ices. Have you seen them?" "Ices?" cried the Queen of Hearts. "Are there any ices? I'm horribly thirsty." "I don't mean those kind of ices," replied the other in injured tones; "I'm looking for the Ice of Spides."

Japanese advertisers believe in a lavish use of similes. "Step inside!" is the invocation of a big multiple shop in Tokyo. "You will be welcomed as fondly as a ray of sunshine after a rainy day. Each one of our assistants is as amiable as a father seeking a husband for a dowerless daughter. Goods are dispatched to customers' houses with the rapidity of a shot from the cannon's mouth." A grocer proclaims that his "superfine vinegar is more acid than the tongue of the most fiendish mother-in-law."

"I'll ring for Nora to bring a fresh pitcher of water," said the professor's wife. "You doubtless mean a pitcher of fresh water," corrected her husband. "I wish you would pay more attention to your rhetoric; your mistakes are curious." Ten minutes later the professor said: "That picture would show to better advantage if you were to hang it over the clock." "You doubtless mean above the clock," she retorted quietly. "If we were to hang it over the clock we couldn't tell the time. I wish you would be more careful with your rhetoric, my dear; your mistakes are curious."

The old home stuff and the midnight study by the log fire can be overdone, in the opinion of Governor Cox. With both himself and Candidate Harding looming up as sainted rulers after starting as printers' devils it seems like throwing stones at glass houses, but as Cox points out: "We are both the real thing, and not a bit like a certain office-seeking acquaintance of mine. 'Look, my friends,' cried Bill; 'I am a horny-handed son of toil, and here are the tools I used.' As he waved a trowel and a hammer in the air he went on:

"Two years ago I was a working bricklayer, and although prosperity has smiled on me, I still treasure the implements which brought me my bread and butter." Wild cheers greeted the statement and the tools were handed round for inspection. Bill thought to make his point more telling by exclaiming: 'Brother workmen, can I rely on you for support?' 'You sure can,' cried a man who was examining the tools with an expression of awe. 'A chap who can lay bricks with a gardener's trowel must be an extra clever guy.'"

The hardened grouch was in the club smoking-room and was bawling his innings. "It's a vile country," he growled. "A fellow can't afford to live because of the income tax, and he's afraid to die because of the death duties. If only the government would play the game straight—" "Oh, I think they're straight enough," interrupted the other who was present. "Straight!" retorted the grouch in a tone of withering scorn. "Yes, they're all straight—so much so that if any one of them were to swallow a nail he'd cough up a corkscrew! Now look here—" But his interlocutor had fled.

They are still chuckling down San Diego way over the old-timer who for a spell was in command of one of the Mexican border detachments. Seems the old chap summoned his adjutant to headquarters one morning after parade and gave him a good dressing down on account of the slovenliness of the troop. Now it chances to be an A1 troop, and the adjutant was sure that everything had been as perfect as it could possibly be. He told the colonel so. "That will do, sir," snapped the colonel. "There must be uniformity in an army to differentiate it from a mob. This morning there was a noticeable lack of uniformity, especially in the band. You will inform the bandmaster that he must instruct his trombone players to work their trombone slides in unison. I must have uniformity in the regiment."

THE MERRY MUSE.

A Maid's Way.

Loose-gowned, with hair awry,
She sits before the firelight gleaming—
Foregoes the pleasure of the dance
To spend the silent hours dreaming;
From out the flames step cavaliers.
Strong, handsome fellows, death defying.
Who pledge a maid a knightly love,
A deep devotion, never dying,
And womanlike, she worships them,
She loves each lover's pledge and parley!
(But when it comes to theatres
I notice this—she goes with Charley!)

The cavaliers give way to one,
A cowboy, handsome, young, and dashing,
Who hears the hanner of Romance,
With silver spurs and hardware clashing—
An aimless rover wild and free,
And truly of an humble station,
But in the subtle firelight!
He quite commands her adoration!
She pledges him undying love,
And asks as much of him; hut will he?
(And when it comes to dances—well Invariably she goes with Billy!)

"The fickleness of maids," you say;
Well, I admit these shifts of fancy
Are womanly in every way
And true of every May and Nancy;
But they should not be grilled for that—
It's only just their habit, bless 'em—
They'll dodge all such entanglements
If I have any mind to guess 'em!
For somewhere in the Lady Book
Is writ this gem of woman's diction:
"The simplest sort of man in hand Is worth a dozen heaux in fiction."
—Buffalo News.

Vers Libre.

Some people like old singing rhymes;—
Others claim that poetry should Not be written in rhyme or measure,
That this hampers the lofty soul
Which would fly without beat of wing
Into the boundless reaches
Of the sky. Feeling out in all Directions without Consciousness of contact with Anything that would circumscribe
Or check or limit
Such freedom.
In other words
They would express exalted numbers
In free or jerky or long-drawn-out
Prose. So let them write. . . .
I like their freedom—when they do not hold me up
With some too sudden or spasmodic
Short, free Line.

Thus let them write—so long as they leave me
Some little rhymes with which I may make free.
For when I wish to muse I take to verse,
Knowing that it is bad, thankful it is not worse!
—Helen E. Poynter in Judge.

A. Maurice Low doesn't like New York. In the London Evening Post he says: "In New York every man and woman appears to be too busy with his or her affairs to have the slightest interest in the stranger or give him a civil word. Ask a man on the street a question and he is afraid you are going to pick his pocket or sell him a gold brick."

Goats' Milk Ice-Cream.

Ice-cream made of goats' milk and flavored with rose leaves is the delicacy par excellence of Greece and Crete, according to an American Red Cross worker recently returned from abroad. To Americans, whose palates are attuned to the rich, creamy product of the Jersey cow, the goats' milk ice-cream doesn't sound very delectable. But flavored with rose leaves it is really delicious, 'tis said. If such epicurean delight can be compounded from the milk of the goat, why not try adding fresh rose leaves to the American brand of ice-cream? It might prove as popular as "caramel sundae" or "banana surprise." Goats' milk is whiter than cows' milk and ice-cream frozen from it has almost the blue tinge of skimmed milk, unless colored by the petals of the rose. Its flavor is peculiar, but to the citizens of Mitylene it has no peer.

BUNNY PROVES HE CAN FIGHT.
The strange fears that seem to paralyze a rabbit when he is attacked by any of the weasel tribe have often been observed. Apparently it can not make the slightest effort at defense and submits to the fatal bite without a sign of resistance. That there are exceptional rabbits, however, appears from an incident witnessed by a distinguished British scientist.
Through the grass of the field in which this natural was walking something was creeping very quietly. This was made evident by the waving of the grass blades. About twenty yards away, out in the field, a rabbit squatted in the afternoon sun—a hunched, fat, comfortable-looking little gray brown figure. He had been there for half an hour, quite motionless.
The hidden creature in the long grass was slowly and surely stalking the rabbit. At length the waving grass stems ceased to move. The stalker had gone to within two yards of the rabbit and was about to make its rush. The long grass ceased here and beyond the stalker had no cover.
Then, all of a sudden, the rabbit reversed its position. It did it so quickly and quietly that the watcher scarcely noticed it.
Since there no longer was any need of concealment the enemy stood up and came forth—a heady-eyed and sinister male stoat. He was really a pretty little chap and spruce as a dandy, looking anything but the professional slayer that he was.
He stood looking at the rabbit for a few moments, his keen head well up, poised on his long, snakey neck.
Then he made his rush. It was quite slow—a heady-eyed and sinister male stoat. He would have difficulty in avoiding it.
When the stoat was within two inches of the rabbit he stopped short, and then, very quickly, darted round behind the bunny. This is the regular stoat manoeuvre—to dart round to the side of the prey and, leaping onto the back of the neck, to deliver that single terrible bite of all the weasel tribe at the soft cartilage at the base of the brain.
The next instant the stoat was lying on its back, with all the wind knocked out of him, and the rabbit was quietly sitting, hunched up, and facing him as before. It was a surprising and most unexpected defeat. As the stoat reared to deliver the fatal bite bunny pivoted to meet him, quickly jumped into the air, and landed a full power kick with both of his long, powerful hind legs on the stoat's chest.
Now, a rabbit's hind legs are very long and strong, and, like the kangaroo's legs, they are a most effective weapon. Fortunately for their foes rabbits do not appear to have found out what a useful weapon they possess. How this one discovered it would be a hard question to answer—possibly in fighting some other huck rabbit. The discovery once made, the inoffensive and timid bunny became a foe to be reckoned with.

As for the stoat, he got up, stared hard at the first rabbit he had ever met that showed fight, and, turning on his heels, slowly galloped away.

COMMUNITY APARTMENTS
In the midst of the most palatial homes of San Francisco, on north-west corner of Jackson and Laguna Streets, I will build a Community Apartment House—nine stories high—Class "A" fireproof construction—one or two homes on each floor—beautiful garden setting—unobstructed view of San Francisco Bay and Golden Gate.
Our architect, Mr. G. A. Applegarth, on a recent trip to New York City, where this type of home is the vogue, inspected many Community Apartments and assures me that our building in all of its appointments will equal the best he saw there.
Each apartment has ten to twelve spacious rooms—private elevator lobby—each bedroom with private bath and shower—additional servants' rooms and store rooms on terrace floor—altogether equivalent to the average high-class house in the best districts. 75% of all the housekeeping troubles are taken over by the Community management. Investment and expense of operation about one-third.
These homes should attract those maintaining both city and country places, being ready for occupancy at a moment's notice for a day, week or longer period. Always in running order, with heat, lighting, garage and service at all times.
Refrigerating plant providing continuous supply of ice from coils in each apartment; well-equipped laundry with washing machines, mangle, etc.; vacuum cleaning by building attendants; garage with competent mechanics.

The Recall.

The Argonaut does not believe in the principle of the recall. It persistently opposed its adoption and it has persistently opposed its application. It holds it to be essentially vicious and a direct incentive to electoral carelessness.

At the present time there is a weighty proposal to recall certain judges, supervisors, and other city officials. The Argonaut believes that all of them are guilty, that they are a disgrace to the city, to the state, and to the nation. None the less these men were elected by popular vote. They were not elected ignorantly, nor under the conviction that they would worthily discharge their duties. They were elected because of their political, labor, or religious affiliations, because their supporters believed that they would illicitly gain by the election of their friends. The fitness of these men was not even for a moment considered by thousands of those who voted for them. Otherwise they could not have been elected at all. The exact nature of their present shame was not, of course, foreseen, but they were none the less known to be of the lowest type. It is no exaggeration to say that their known reputation won for them thousands of votes. If there are scoundrels in official positions it is because we elected scoundrels to those positions. If we did not know them to be scoundrels we are guilty of the additional offense of indolence and apathy. How many of those who are now clamoring for the recall of these men actually voted for them, or some of them? What would they say to a proposal to recall the voters, to disfranchise them? And in what way will the recall be a guaranty that other scoundrels will not be elected to take the place of those who are ousted? Remember what happened following the recall of Judge Weller.

It may further be asked why we should recall a few wretched underlings and leave Mayor Rolph untouched. Every one knows the extent to which he has poisoned the official life of the city. The actual results of that poison as it seeped down to the slums are conjectural, but they must be considerable. The city that tolerates Rolphism can never be other than corrupt. It would corrupt paradise. Financially impeccable, perhaps even well-meaning in his own silly way, Mayor Rolph has established the principle that nothing matters except votes. To recall a few supervisors and cheap judges and to ignore Mayor Rolph is the height of absurdity. But why recall any one? Why jump from the frying-pan into the fire? Why not resolve henceforth to vote for decency?

The Price We Pay.

The public wrath that reached the explosion point last week was not due wholly to the unspeakable crimes charged against the half-dozen ruffians under arrest. It had a deeper origin than that. There was a strong suspicion, amounting almost to a certainty, that these particular crimes belonged to a series, and that the malefactors had been continually sheltered by political influences. That the law should be brought into contempt was no new thing. We live in an atmosphere of contempt for the law. But that there should be anything like licensed immunity for such abominations as this was more than the public could stand. It was evident that the authorities were first perplexed by the popular rage and then frightened. They displayed a hectic activity, and arrested every suspicious character in sight. Then came the raid on the shack at Santa Rosa, the murder of the police officers, and the summary lynching of the three men in the county jail. The law having been brought into contempt by the gangsters, it was then brought into further contempt by the lynchers who pretended to vindicate it.

The lynching was not the result of outraged public sentiment. Nor was it the work of amateurs. It was planned with skill, every eventuality was foreseen and provided for, and it was executed with expert precision. It was probably in its organization and direction the work of San Francisco policemen, or at least there is reason to believe that it had their assistance and coöperation. Otherwise it could hardly have been done at all, and certainly not in the way in which it was done. Their motive may have been revenge for the murder of their comrades, or it may have been disgust at the impotence, or worse, of the agents of the criminal law. Or, again, it may have been fear that the criminals would "squeal." In the case of one of the lynched men, Fitts, there was no positive evidence to connect him either with the outrages in San Francisco or with the actual shooting of the police officers at Santa Rosa. Undoubtedly he was in bad company, undoubtedly he was a bad man, but then these are not capital offenses.

But there is no use in crying over spilled milk. The city has been disgraced, first by the crimes committed in the Howard Street house and by the suspected condonation of many and many a similar crime that preceded them, and secondly by the lynching—one might say murder—of some of the guilty men and of one who was not clearly guilty. But it is to be feared that there is another and an even greater disgrace, and it is to be found in the entire system under which we operate our courts and our police force. It is a disgrace in which all must share. The public created that system and, although it operates openly, the public tolerates and sustains it.

Human nature seems to demand a scapegoat and it is likely that the police will be called on to bear much of the responsibility for the immunity that has certainly been given to a peculiarly dangerous class of criminal. The police must have known what these wretches were doing because they were doing it constantly. Nearly every day adds its quota to the disgusting tale. The criminals were protected—every one knows that; and they were protected because they belonged to the prize-ring business, which, itself, is a violation of the law, and because the prize-ring business was in control of votes. But it is certainly not fair to assume that the police initiated this protection. It was not the police who appointed a prize-ring ruffian to a position in connection with the children's playgrounds. It was the mayor who did that, and he did it under the same general system that extended its protecting tentacles around the hell in Howard Street. The police are not elected. They are not particularly interested in votes. But they have to obey those who are interested in votes. The police have their faults, and grave ones, but if we want to find the source of these abominations we shall find it among the elected officials.

The police, in point of fact, have a difficult part to play. They are under the orders of officials who have not the least regard for the criminal law and who look upon the force merely as one of the agencies by which they secure political advantage. If the reform wind happens to be blowing, as at the present moment, then the police are required to arrest well-known criminals whom at any other time they would not dare to touch. As a result the police themselves have no regard for the law. How can they have? They have no regard for anything except the particular political policy of their elected superiors, Mayor Rolph, for example. And that policy may demand the protection of the criminal on Monday and his arrest on Wednesday, as the tide of votes seems to veer now one way and now another. If the police were left only to the guidance of the criminal law they would arrest all criminals if only from a sense of professional pride. But there is not a policeman in San Francisco who does not know that there are criminals whom he must not touch. If he does he will be punished.

It is all our own fault. There will be no abatement of the evil so long as we elect creatures like Mayor Rolph, whose field of vision is occupied by nothing but votes, who is incapable of any other motive, any other inspiration, any other incentive. When we learn to elect men who will honestly sustain the law and who will insist on honesty from their subordinates we shall have no more Howard Street infernos and no more lynchings. These are the price that we pay for our Rolphs et hoc genus omne.

It is a good thing to punish the criminals, but punishment has a relatively slight relation to reform. The source of evil is actually in the electorate, which to a large extent has lost alike the will and the capacity to demand fitness and nothing but fitness. So long as men are elected to public posts in the hope that they will serve some special interest, so long we shall have venality in high places and criminality in low places. Actually they are the same thing.

The President and Sinn Fein.

Reports, public and private, show that the City of New York has been deeply stirred by the riotous attack upon the Union Club. That every great city should sometimes be the scene of turbulent violences is to be expected. No city is exempt. It is a part of the history of civilization. But in this particular crime there were factors as unusual as they were portentous. The rioters comprised the entire congregation of the vast Catholic cathedral, a congregation summoned for the most solemn of objects, but so little moved by the normal and decent sanctities of the occasion that almost in a moment it became a horde of savages intent only upon brutality and destruction. The situation was aggravated by the misbehavior of Monsignor Lavelle, who seemed to suppose that all legal and orderly rights must bow to the will of a mob if only it be a Sinn Fein mob. It was further aggravated by the far more serious misconduct of Archbishop Hayes, who from the leisure and seclusion of his study, without the plea of emergency and terror that might be the defense of Monsignor Lavelle, indicted a long letter of reproof, not to those who instigated the crime that he thus practically palliated, but to those loyal and responsible Catholics who offended the "etiquette and discipline" of the church by a public protest that will be applauded by all good Americans. The list of Catholics who signed the protest, and whom the archbishop carefully insults, contained names deservedly honored throughout Catholic America. They rendered a distinguished service to their church. They went far to remove from that church the disgrace unjustly brought upon it by Archbishop Hayes and by Monsignor Lavelle. Their action will be gratefully remembered by those who would repudiate the impetuous conclusion that the church in America is willing to condone crime if, through the agency of crime, it may advance its European policies or satisfy its European resentments.

And now we may turn—finally we may hope—from the offenses of a few ecclesiastical dignitaries to another phase of a problem that calls loudly for settlement. If the Sinn Fein movement in America was no more than one of those organized foreign sentiments that necessarily find root in a nation built up largely by immigration it would be relatively innocuous. At least it would be tolerable. But we know now that it is very much more than that. It has assumed a dictatorial status in American affairs that is neither innocuous nor tolerable, that is alike a nuisance and a peril. On a basis of a patriotism that is wholly foreign and of sentiments that are hostile to America, it seeks to exercise a perpetual electoral threat to which weak men succumb and by which strong men are affronted. But its activities are now by no means electoral only. We know that the sentiments that led the Sinn Fein in Ireland to work and to pray for a German victory found their corresponding reflection upon this side of the Atlantic. At a time when Americans were dying by thousands on the battlefields of Europe their sailor comrades were being stoned by Sinn Feiners in Irish towns, and Sinn Feiners everywhere were hoping for the success of German arms. The Sinn Fein measurably prolonged the war, and to the precise extent to which it prolonged the war it was guilty of the death of American soldiers. It was the friend of Germany and it made no concealment of that shameful fact. It boasted of it. It is boasting of it still, as we may learn from the evidence being given before the bogus "commission" in Washington.

Such being the incontestable facts, we may reasonably ask that Mr. Eamon de Valera, who calls himself the president of the Irish Republic, be invited forthwith to leave this country. Mr. de Valera is here for the single and undisguised purpose of promoting a foreign cause, and that cause is one of hostility to a friendly power. He makes no secret of his desire to persuade this country into courses that would result in war, to embroil this country in a quarrel that is not hers. He is unconcerned with the fortunes of this country and indifferent to its welfare. His sympathies and his sentiments are inimical to American interests. They are given exclusively to another and a foreign nation.

Within the last few days Mr. de Valera has publicly expressed his approbation of murder. Naked and unarmed men, dragged from their beds and hideously slain, suffered, says Mr. de Valera, the just fate of spies. He has applauded the assassination of policemen and officials who were doing no more than their duty. Now America can not afford to permit this public applause of assassination. She can not afford by her silence to condone the most barbarous of crimes, and one that has so tragic an appeal to discontent and dementia. She can not afford to permit the contention that assassination becomes tolerable when a political label is attached to it. She can not afford that her own disaffected be familiarized with the idea of assassination as a remedy for wrongs. That Mr. de Valera should be allowed publicly to defend the assassination of any one, under any circumstances, is an outrage against the American hospitality that he has abused and that should now be denied to him.

It is the sincere hope of the Argonaut that President Harding will rid the country of this pest. It can be done without any exercise of arbitrary authority and without any affront to Mr. de Valera's alleged dignities. The President of the United States has great intangible powers. A word in the right quarter will be enough. A hint that Mr. de Valera's presence is unwelcome and that it must be transferred elsewhere will be sufficient to remove a dangerous agitator who has chosen the prudent part of advocating assassination from America rather than participating in the dangers of his confederates and dupes in Ireland. A similar word to those leaders of the Catholic church—perhaps not many—who forget their sacred duties in order to foment instead of to assuage the passions of the mob will be equally efficacious. The Villard "commission" in Washington should be notified that its poisonous and provocative activities must cease. All these things are morally wrong. Politically they are dangerous and abominable.

To express the hope that President Harding will grasp this nettle is no mere figure of speech. The Argonaut was, and is, among the strenuous supporters of the new President. It believes him to be a man of character and of courage, wise in council and resolute in leadership. None the less it will be well for him to recognize, as undoubtedly he will recognize, that his initial measures will be watched with no ordinary attention, and perhaps in a spirit of criticism due by no means to distrust, but rather to the emergent character of the events with which he must deal. It will be well for him to remember that he owes much of his success to the faults of his predecessor rather than to his own administrative virtues that have yet to be demonstrated, and that he will best demonstrate those administrative virtues by resolutely rejecting every persuasion to govern his decisions by a consideration of the votes that are involved or to surrender to those insidious forces that would allow expediency to usurp the place of principle. The electorate believes that the country is now in a fair way to be rid of the old order of things and that a new order of administrative dignity is at hand in which there will be no truckling to the votes of factions, no electoral hesitations between right and wrong, no timorous trimming of the sails to catch the shifting winds of popular favor. If these expectations should seem to lack fulfillment the public disappointment will be alike deep and resentful.

The National Estimates.

The irresponsible manner in which the government is now being conducted is clearly indicated in the tremendous estimates for appropriations sent to Congress by the executive departments. All hands have cut loose from restraint and have made the book of estimates an even more ghastly joke than it has been in the past. But at least one good purpose has been achieved. It has brought into glaring relief the necessity for budget reform. Congress has abundant excuse for disregarding the estimates entirely. They are not even an index to the actual necessities of the situation.

Notable in the estimates is the character of the demands made by the army and navy. At least these demands, so far as they were prepared by military men, are submitted in good faith. Army and navy officers are obsessed with the imminence of war. Newton Baker's professional advisers have led him into the course where he is building an army far beyond the limitations imposed by Congress, and is openly piling up a tremendous deficiency.

The navy's estimates for public works, that is, the upbuilding of navy yards, naval stations, and other shore establishments, it is to be observed, contemplate concentration of these expenditures on the Pacific Coast and the Pacific insular possessions. Thus, while the department asks a sum in excess of twenty million dollars for these purposes, it proposes to spend more than twelve millions of the total on the Pacific Coast and in Hawaii, Guam, Samoa, and the Philippines, the heaviest proposed expenditure being at Bremerton and Pearl Harbor. Of course all this spells a war scare.

For Secretary of State.

Certain Washington correspondents, notably the correspondent of the New York Tribune, are satisfied that Mr. Root will be offered and will accept the post of Secretary of State under the new administration. This information is said to come from Senator Sutherland, who believes that it would be a "public calamity" if there should be a failure to secure the services of Mr. Root in the new cabinet.

The Argonaut is very heartily of the same opinion. We have had enough of the incredibly stupid theory that "any one can do anything" so far as high governmental duties are concerned, and that there need be no other qualification for those duties than a respectable party regularity. So far as foreign affairs are concerned Mr. Root is head and shoulders above any other man in America. He has already occupied the position of Secretary of State with extraordinary distinction. He is on a level with the best men that have ever filled that station. To ignore Mr. Root in favor of Senator Fall—an eminently respectable man, no doubt, but with no fitness for the conduct of our foreign affairs—would indeed be a "public calamity." Moreover, it would be a portent of mediocrity that the new administration can not afford to invite.

There would, of course, be an outcry from a few such extremists as Borah and Johnson, who would pretend to see in Mr. Root's appointment some sort of surrender to the league of nations. Of course it would be nothing of the sort. Mr. Root, together with all other men of intelligence, believes that much may be done for the cause of world peace by some sort of international arrangement, and particularly by a codification of international law. But the extremists are not likely to be very vociferous, and it does not matter if they are. They will not have a casting vote nor hold the balance of power. Doubtless they will favor us with a painful discharge of oratory, but they are not dangerous. Moreover, they must be settled with at some time, and the sooner the better.

It is to be hoped that we shall soon hear authoritatively of Mr. Root's selection. It is not too much to say that it would have a steadying effect upon the affairs of the world. Mr. Root's capacities are universally known. His attitude and competence are universally known. We have had enough of alleged statesmen who "darken counsel without wisdom." It is high time for a master hand in the Department of State.

Editorial Notes.

The Civic League evidently does not believe Lawler's denials that he tried to save the gangsters from the police. The league report says that he brought the criminals to San Francisco and that he then tried to rescue them. Attention may also be directed to that section of the report which says: "It is a fact that Lawler was able to exercise his influence owing to his close relationship to the personal attorney and adviser of the chief executive of the city, and that through this influence he obtained the position of secretary and superintendent of the playgrounds. It is also a fact that the law partner of the personal attorney of the mayor is president of the board of police commissioners. These facts undoubtedly enabled Lawler to bring to bear influences, in various ways, in different departments of the city government. It was not necessary for either the mayor's personal attorney or his law partner, the president of the police commission, to use personally any influence they possessed to assist Lawler in what he did. The mere fact of his close connection to these gentlemen so prominent in the city administration was sufficient for him to get results."

A bulletin from Constantinople says that the Russians have now three armies in the Caucasus and that they are fortifying the Baku peninsula in apprehension of a general Mohammedan uprising. The source of the bulletin is a little suspicious. The Bolshevik government has been doing everything it can to promote a general Mohammedan uprising, and the three Russian armies now in the Caucasus are more likely to be allies than enemies of an aggressive Islam. Without doubt there is "something doing" in the Mohammedan world, and if it should come to an explosion it may be big enough to shake the world.

Colonel George Harvey doubtless believes that he has a plan for world peace "which dwarfs all previous propositions designed to democratize the world and prevent future wars." He would have an association of nations that should pledge their governments for all time never to engage in offensive warfare until the taking of a plebiscite. But what is an offensive war? Did any government ever yet plead guilty to an offensive war? Are we to suppose that it is always governments that make war, and not peoples? Ferrero said many years ago that the greatest danger to the peace of the world came from the democracies, that they were far more pugnacious than their rulers. How long are we cherish the absurd delusion that right judgments always come from ballot-boxes? It is probably true that governments have more often resisted the pugnacities of their people than indulged in pugnacities of their own.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The University and Socialism.

BERKELEY, December 11, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Every one interested in the welfare of the University of California was disappointed over the failure of Amendment 12 to receive a majority of the votes cast. While many theories have been advanced as to the reason of this, I do not think the right one, or at least one of the most important, has been mentioned.

My business takes me over the state, and brings me in touch with farmers, ranchers, business, and professional men, many of whom have had or now have sons and daughters in the university, and it may be interesting, and perhaps enlightening, for me to quote some of the reasons, or the one most often mentioned, and it is this—the "economic" trend of the university has been to promote "socialism," "government ownership," and to condemn our present system of government. As a number expressed themselves, they consider it has "far too much money to spend now when they are able to retain upon its staff of instructors or professors many of the theorists they now have."

Under the guise of "economics," "idealism," "democracy," some of the professors are quite active in inculcating the young men and women with their socialistic doctrines, teaching them that no "justice" is possible under our "present system of government."

A number I talked with referred to the fact that some of these "democratic" professors a short time ago threatened to exclude from their classes any student who gave out for publication or discussed with their parents or friends some of the things they were taught—that it did not concern the public.

Another mentioned that professors were employed who couldn't make a "success of a peanut stand," to say nothing of a city government as manager, and yet he was an "authority" on "economics" and there was sufficient funds available for him to travel to various cities enunciating his wisdom as to how business and government should be conducted.

Several I talked with related instances of their children being directed to prepare papers upon certain "economic" topics, and if the papers did not wholly approve and coincide with the socialistic doctrines of his "professors" he was made to rewrite them again and again before they were "accepted" by the "professor."

Another spoke of the same thing occurring with his son and daughter, the topic having relation to advocating government ownership and similar communistic doctrines.

Many emphatically expressed their opposition to providing further funds, or paying taxes to support such instructors and professors, it being quite generally known there is a surplus of this character on the university pay-roll.

It was mentioned the November election indicated that the nation had awakened to the danger of having men and women of this stamp at the head of the government, and that it was time for the parents to take a more active interest in what was being taught their sons and daughters.

On another point there was unanimous approval, and that was the fact that President Barrows was at the head of the university. It was hoped he would be encouraged to furnish the right kind of instructors, who believe in the worth of our system of government, the integrity of our institutions, and the welfare of the people as a whole, as opposed to the class distinctions and bolshevistic doctrines secretly and insidiously advocated by those who do not wish the public informed upon what is being taught.

These are some of the opinions that prevail, and perhaps not without good reasons, as these parents must have some knowledge of what is being taught.

Yours truly,
J. B. MITCHELL.

"The Religious View."

BOSTON, December 8, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I wish to compliment you for publishing the extremely interesting letter, "The Religious View." It is refreshing to see the truth in print. The churches that advocate prohibition would do well to join hands and instead of professing to preach Christianity follow the Bible. Mohammedanism would be a more appropriate name for the religion they teach. The principle of prohibition defies God's plan in creating man. The Bible teaches us to withstand temptation in all things—not excluding wine or strong drink. This plan is conducive to making strong men.

Kindly send me ten copies of your issue, November 6th. I wish to mail Mr. Coatsworth's letter to some clergymen and others, with the hope that it will do some good. It should.

I also wish to compliment you upon your attitude toward prohibition. Can it be possible that the various publications that print editorials and articles favoring prohibition are sincere? I doubt it. It is to be hoped you will continue to use your efforts to straighten out the iniquitous Eighteenth Amendment. It has outraged the Constitution, and the present situation (the result) is most serious. It would help if we had complete records from the hospitals, insane asylums, and undertakers showing the results of prohibition for the past six months. It is pleasant to read of the county jails being "empty," etc. But it is unjust to credit prohibition with these changes. The present system of probation (not prohibition), together with the labor situation and other changed conditions, have much to do with the jails being less crowded, not overlooking the partial closing of the saloon. Had the prohibitionist confined his efforts to abolishing the saloon a great service would have been done the country. The saloon as it was allowed to be run was unquestionably a menace, but that is no excuse for "bone dry" prohibition. Two wrongs never have made a right. Strict regulation (Federal, if necessary) and education would overcome the evil of excessive use of alcoholics. The manufacture and sale of wines, beers, and liquors could be controlled. The public would get behind a proposition of this sort.

Yours very truly,
J. B. RICHARDSON.

Church and Sinn Fein.

OAKLAND, December 14, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I wish to express my pleasure and approval of your article on "Church and Sinn Fein" which appeared in your number of December 11th. On the strength of it I bought three copies to mail to friends.

It is a pleasure to find a paper that takes the brave stand that you do. It takes courage to do that at the present time, and even though readers may not write you a letter approving your stand, they wish you every success.

May you keep up the good work and spread the truth.

Sincerely yours,
J. E. WILLIAMS.

Sinn Fein versus America.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 8, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Permit me to thank you and express my appreciation of your editorial, "Sinn Fein versus America." It is reminiscent of the writings of the late Frank Pixley, when he wielded his trenchant pen in the interests of the Argonaut.

It is good to know that there is another writer who has the courage of his convictions. There never was a time in our national history when it was more necessary to bring these matters to the notice of the reading public. Let our slogan be, "Wake up, Americans!"

Yours truly,
G. J. V.

THE CHURCH AND THE SINN FEIN.

(From the Los Angeles Times, December 12, 1920.)

Ireland is to a great extent a Catholic country. The Catholic church, on the other hand, is—as the name implies—universal.

It has no geographical boundaries, neither can it be restricted to any race or tongue or dynasty or nation.

The doors of the Catholic church are open to every man, woman, or child who wishes to come into the fold for human solace or spiritual guidance. Ireland has no preferred property rights in this great Christian institution. It is not a national church. It belongs to humanity.

Yet certain radical supporters of the Irish rebellion have attempted to use the great name and influence of the Catholic church in Sinn Fein propaganda to arouse sentiment and raise money in America for their own political ends.

Extremists even drag down the church from its high spiritual mission for the salvation of souls to that of an active partisan in a quarrel carried on by the shedding of blood. They would have the American people believe that the Holy Church is in sympathy with the terrorism practiced by the Sinn Fein irreconcilables.

In doing so, if they are Catholics, they are committing a grave offense against the church to whose spiritual benefits they have been admitted. They are desecrating the altar at which they profess to worship. If they are not Catholics they are damaging that church more than they are helping Ireland.

To assume that all Irishmen are Catholics is incorrect; to assume that all Catholics are Irishmen is ridiculous. As though the part could be greater than the whole.

Those who propagate these views are not good Americans, good Irishmen, or good Catholics. They are not even fifty-fifty. They are triple hyphenates. All hyphenated allegiance is particularly objectionable to our American notions of loyalty.

That these trouble-breeders are utterly indifferent to the dignity of the Catholic church and the laws of the United States was demonstrated in the New York street riot that desecrated a solemn mass just held in St. Patrick's Cathedral and that equally disgraced our national feast of Thanksgiving.

As was to be expected, the Catholic church very properly repudiated the acts of the mob of Irish sympathizers who, after just filing out of the doors of the cathedral, were guilty of a lawless attack on the Union Club. Sixty leading New York Catholics signed this letter of protest which we reproduce from the columns of the New York Tribune:

As Americans and Catholics we protest against the infusion of politics into our beloved church. It is particularly deplorable that an outrage upon American liberty should have taken place upon our national day of Thanksgiving and coming as it did from a mob of people who had just attended mass at the cathedral. In order to remove any doubt as to our condemnation of this un-American proceeding we are sending a copy of this communication to the press.

That letter speaks the true spirit of the Catholic who goes to church to absorb spiritual blessings, not political propaganda. The New York Tribune deals with the same untoward incident in a short and caustic editorial, which we quote as follows:

The scene on Fifth Avenue was not calculated to persuade the wavering that the Irish majority can be trusted to be just and tolerant to the Irish minority. To tear down the British flag in New York is scarcely a good way to induce our people to assist in elevating the Irish flag in Dublin.

Beside his inopportune remarks concerning wisdom, Monsignor Lavelle said another interesting thing. He referred to the American Republic as "Greater Ireland." Hyphenism is supposed to be dead, but here it is again grinning at us. We have been annexed to the mythical government of De Valera, and it is the privilege of this gentleman, who steadily refused to take the risks in the older part of his dominion, to impose his taste in flags on us.

There are over 16,000,000 Catholic worshippers in America today, nor has the United States any body of citizens more loyal to its institutions nor more unswerving in its stand for civil law and order. It is preposterous to suppose that the Catholic church in America will allow any group of aliens to hyphenate its allegiance to God or country. It is libelous to assume that Catholicism approves the Sinn Fein programme of secret murder and midnight assassination. The Tidings, the Los Angeles Catholic organ, is not true to its church; it stands for bloodshed, riot, and hyphenated religion.

The loyal Catholics of America, for the honor of their church and for the sake of suffering humanity, are anxious to see an end to the reign of terror in Ireland and to see the restoration of peace and harmony among all the war-distracted nations of the world.

For this ancient and mighty church is today one of civilization's strongest bulwarks against the lawless elements that seek to dethrone God and install the universal worship of atheistic materialism.

Ireland today is a menace to the stability of human institutions. For the sake of that country itself, for the sake of Great Britain, for the sake of America, for the sake of our common Christian civilization it is imperative that some solution be found to end the tragic jumble of hatred and misunderstanding that threatens to develop into an incurable world cancer.

The Times is not surprised to note the wave of resentment among loyal Catholics against the campaigning of the Sinn Fein elements in the church, both in priesthood and laity.

GENEROSITY.

(Translated from L'Echo de Paris for the Living Age by Pierre Benoit.)

I do not remember in just what year this incident took place. The curious can consult the records of the First Zouaves. Colonel Dubail commanded the regiment at that time and the regulation had just gone into effect abolishing turbans in favor of neckcloths. It was distressing, when one had become accustomed to a beautiful white turban which it took four men to roll, to have nothing except a cloth for the back of the neck, a miserable rag which we kept in our cartridge boxes.

My battalion, the fourth, had just left Koléa for Boghar, where we pass the summer under the great tents, the marabouts, which will hold twelve zouaves. I will speak later of the little tents, which we called guitounes.

My battalion was at Boghar, but I was not with it. My section had been designated to act as convoy to a detachment of joyeux and of military prisoners of whom we were to take the joyeux to the barracks of the first Battalion d'Afrique at Boghar, and the disciplinaires to the railway under construction from Berrouaghia to Laghouat. Only teamsters, strictly speaking, are liable for this duty, but they are a lazy lot and useless as guards. All this ought to be clear enough. I hope no one will blame me for going into these details.

We left Médéa at 8 o'clock in the evening. At 10 o'clock, after passing Bentchicao, one of the wagons broke down, and the lieutenant, a sandy-haired, hot-tempered chap, began to swear like a crazy man. Then he decided that we should wait where we were until daylight, when the wagon could be repaired. As far as we were concerned, we were perfectly willing to do so.

In the moonlight the country was yellow and black, cut by ravines like deep blue scars. The joyeux, being the new crop of undesirable recruits from France, were still in civilian clothes. We herded them in a crowd into a half-ruined old shed. There were only two military prisoners; they came from Algiers, from the court-martial there. At the halts they slept in separate tents. I must explain here about the guitounes.

The tents of zouaves were made of six pieces of canvas. Each zouave carries his piece rolled up on his pack. Six get together, and that makes a tent, a sort of cooperative society. When the number of zouaves is not divisible by six, there are some who are forced to sleep just like the prisoners. These latter lie each under his own piece of canvas, folded in the middle and held by two sticks, which makes a little individual tent, not knee high, and just big enough to slide into. Once you are inside you can't make the slightest motion without being seen. That makes it easier for the sentinel. At the halt at Bentchicao I was on guard over the two tents of the prisoners from midnight till 2 o'clock.

"Repeat your orders to Candau," said the corporal to the zouave whom I relieved.

"Don't let them move," said my comrade, "at present they're quiet enough, but you never can tell."

They left and I saw the two blue bayonets disappear in the hot gray obscurity, toward our tents, pitched about a hundred yard away in a good location.

A little while before, when we were making camp, it had struck me as a good arrangement. Now, I said to myself vaguely, that they ought to have placed our tents a little nearer those of the prisoners. I walked around them, the canvas never stirred. I looked at my rifle, No. G79585. The bayonet was solidly in place; I let the butt fall heavily on the dry ground.

A slight sound, a voice echoed from the interior of one of the two tents. I stepped back instinctively and listened. The voice came from the right-hand tent. Brokenly, pitifully it murmured my name, "Candau!"

It repeated: "You are Candau, Lucien Candau?"

I ought not to have answered. I did answer: "My name is Candau."

"Candau from Loverchy, near Semnoz?"

I repeated: "Candau, from Loverchy, near Semnoz." And I added: "Who are you?"

"Do you remember Annecy, and the school in the rue Grenette?"

"The school in the rue Grenette! Who are you?"

"I recognized your voice. You don't recognize mine?"

"No!"

"Don't you remember Chanavaz?"

I shuddered. "Emile Chanavaz?" I said.

"That's me," said the voice, with a little, humble laugh.

"The one who took all the prizes?"

"That's me."

"The one who recited the verses when the inspector of the academy came:

"Enfants, qui sur les bancs de l'école laïque, De la gratuité connaissons tout le prix. . . ."

The voice finished it:

"Nous vénérons en vous, monsieur, la République Qui, pour nous libérer, éclaire nos esprits."

"I see you have a good memory after all. I am Emile Chanavaz."

"What are you doing there?" I asked; my throat was dry.

He laughed feebly, "You can see for yourself."

"I mean to say, how did you get there?"

"I wasn't my fault, Candau. I swear it wasn't my fault. An adjutant who had it in for me, who hazed me. . . ."

There was a silence. Never had the heat been so stifling. I had plenty of water in my canteen, but I didn't dare drink any.

"Candau!" the voice wept.

"Speak lower," I said brutally, "you'll wake up the other one."

He kept quiet.

It was I, you understand, I, who began again.

"What do you want? Tobacco?"

He didn't answer. It seemed to me that the canvas moved.

"Hep!" I said, "stop that, or. . . ."

The movement stopped, but the weeping went on: "Candau, my dear Candau."

It was horrible, that broken sobbing in the dry, blue night. The jackals barked and yelped in the ravines.

"Well, what is it?" I said. "Only for speaking to you I've deserved fifteen days in the guardhouse. What do you want?"

He didn't answer.

"To escape, perhaps? Nothing doing, old man."

He answered in a voice which was hardly audible, as if he were dying: "Give me a cigarette."

I leaned toward the opening of the tent. Suddenly my hand was seized and held, a kind of yellow devil sprang out of the ground and I felt a hard blow in the side.

I ground out a string of oaths, which would not make this story any stronger. It was a short fight. I only thought of two things; first not to call for help, for I was clearly in the wrong; secondly never to lose sight of the second tent, for if the other prisoner came out I was done for. It wasn't possible that he was still asleep. He was a clever one and lay low.

In ten seconds I had Chanavaz gasping under my knee, then under my foot. I picked up my rifle and conscientiously beat him up with the butt of it.

He gasped: "You won't tell, Candau. It's a firing squad for me if you do."

"A lot I care!"

But he saw that I didn't call the guard.

Humbly, on his hands and knees, he crawled into his little tent. The triangle of canvas became motionless again as if nothing had happened.

I felt my left side where he had struck me. The cartridge box on that side was cut wide open.

I cried: "You've got a knife!"

Silence.

"You've got a knife," I cried still louder. "Give it up! Give it to me!"

I struck with my rifle at the inside of the tent. A soft yielding mass, a groan, but no answer.

"Yes or no?"

A dying prayer from the tent: "Candau, keep still, listen—"

Oh the dog, I thought to myself, he can hear well enough.

Steps and the glitter of two bayonets. My turn of duty was finished, it was the relief.

"Repeat your orders to Bénéch," said the corporal.

"Don't let them move!" I said.

Bénéch was a great healthy peasant, half asleep. I could see his rifle trembling in his sleepy fingers.

"That's all?" he asked.

I waited perhaps a second. Then, "That's all," I answered.

And he followed the corporal.

I didn't fall asleep immediately, but, after ten minutes, perhaps, I was snoring like the rest.

At daybreak I heard noises in the camp, oaths and cries. They had found Bénéch on his back with a knife in his heart. The two prisoners had disappeared.

Since then I have never been generous with other people's money.

OLD FAVORITES.

Welcome to the Nations.

(Sung at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876.)

Bright on the banners of lily and rose,
Lo, the last sun of our century sets!
Wreath the black cannon that scowled on our foes,
All but her friendships the Nation forgets—
All but her friends and their welcome forgets!
These are around her. But where are her foes?
Lo, while the sun of her century sets,
Peace with her garlands of lily and rose!

Welcome! a shout like the war trumpet's swell
Wakes the wild echoes that slumber around;
Welcome! it quivers from Liberty's hell;
Welcome! the walls of her temple resound.
Hark! the gray walls of her temple resound;
Fade the far voices o'er hillside and dell;
Welcome, still whisper the echoes around;
Welcome, still trembles on Liberty's bell.

Thrones of the Continents! Isles of the Sea!
Yours are the garlands of peace we entwine;
Welcome once more to the land of the free,
Shadowed alike by the palm and the pine;
Softly they murmur, the palm and the pine,
"Hushed is our strife, in the land of the free!"
Over your children their branches entwine,
Thrones of the Continents; Isles of the Sea!
—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Rest.

"Silence sleeping on a waste of ocean—
Sun down—westward traileth a red streak—
One white sea-hird, poised with scarce a motion,
Challenges the stillness with a shriek,
Challenges the stillness, upward wheeling
Where some rocky peak containeth her rude nest;
For the shadows o'er the waters they come stealing,
And they whisper to the silence, 'There is Rest.'"

"Down where the broad Zamhesi River
Glides away into some shadowy lagoon,
Lies the antelope, and hears the leaflets quiver,
Shaken by the sultry breath of noon;
Hears the sluggish water ripple in its flowing;
Feels the atmosphere, with fragrance all-oppress;
Dreams his dreams, and the sweetest is the knowing That above him, and around him, there is Rest."

"Centuries have faded into shadow;
Earth is fertile with the dust of man's decay;
Pilgrims all they were to some bright El Dorado;
But they wearied, and they fainted, by the way.
Some were sick with the surfeit of pleasure;
Some were bowed beneath a care-cumbersome breast;
But they all trod in turn Life's stately measure,
And all paused hetimes to wonder, 'Is there Rest?'"

"Look, O man! to the limitless Hereafter,
When thy Sense shall be lifted from its dust,
When thy Anguish shall be melted into Laughter,
When thy Love shall be sever'd from its Lust,
Then thy Spirit shall be sanctified with seeing
The Ultimate dim Thule of the Blest,
And the Passion-haunted fever of thy being Shall be drifted in a Universe of Rest."—J. S. Paine.

Scores of emigrants from Africa have recently found their way into the United States. Instead of passing the barrage of examinations at Ellis Island these newcomers will be taken in charge by the office of foreign seed and plant introduction in the bureau of plant industry. Each will be given a small section of earth on the experimental plats of the United States Department of Agriculture. There is a beautiful little dwarf lemon which originated in China and is now in this country looking for an opportunity to prove that it can bear its delicious lemons in anybody's greenhouse or sunny room as easily and as well as it can in a Chinese garden. Another Chinese specimen is the large-fruited haw, an unusually large variety of the hawthorn family, with a sour juicy fruit that is especially good in compotes and jellies. As the new immigrants arrive several members out of an older shipment will go out to begin careers of ornamental or economic importance in new homes. The scientists who have watched these older importations serve their novitiate are making preparations to send a few samples to various plantations and gardens. Among these is the pistache nut from the Mediterranean region, which has proved its value in California, where many of these trees are already thriving. The pistache tree of the Levant has a wonderful Chinese relative with ornamental foliage—wine colored in spring and scarlet and yellow in autumn. The nut of the true pistache is much in demand as an article of food and the timber of the Chinese immigrant is valuable for making furniture. Southern Florida had no native nuts except the cocoanut, so the Department of Agriculture brought the Queensland nut from Australia. It flourishes in the new environment, where it is being cultivated and propagated by the bureau of plant industry. The same office is busy with a giant blackberry from Bogota and a dry-land elm from China. The elm has already demonstrated its usefulness, for its grows well in regions that are too arid to support other forest growths. A quality which adds to its value is the ability of this elm to withstand severe windstorms without injury. This feature will enable the tree to grow on the Western plains, where the heavy storms uproot and destroy less tough species.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Sir Ernest Shackleton, explorer, is planning another icy expedition, this time to the North Polar regions.

Major-General Charles Townshend, defender of Kut-el-Amara, has been elected to the House of Commons.

Arnold Bennett is afraid of interviewers. He has been a journalist himself and he has a fear of journalists.

England's new peeress, Jose Collins, who was recently married to an earl, was the daughter of Lottie Collins, of "Tarara-boom-de-ay" fame.

During the ceremony of the "crossing of the equator" on his recent voyage the Prince of Wales burst forth as a poet, composing an "Apostrophe to Neptune." It contains much slang, evidently for shipboard consumption.

Horatio Blanco Fombona, journalist and poet, held by American military forces in Santo Domingo, has gone on a hunger strike as a protest against his imprisonment and also because of the prison diet of beans and potatoes.

Victor Young, the talented violinist, who recently made a successful début in America, has a romantic history. He was the son of a Jewish tailor and was caught in the revolutionary upheaval in Russia until a few months ago.

Kerensky is a man of forty-five years, but has the face of a boy of twenty-three. He has an immense head, very closely shaven, with a series of pronounced bumps that would delight the eye of a phenologist. Mr. Kerensky does not speak English.

Lady Ramsey, formerly Princess "Pat" of Connaught, is living in Paris in a three-room flat that does not even boast a bathroom. However, she outranks the British ambassador to France, and there is much speculation over the peculiar situation of social precedence.

Mary Burt, mayor-elect of Yoncalla, Oregon, is a native daughter of Oregon, a graduate of Pacific University, Forest Grove, Oregon, class of '73. In her kind but resolute face one can trace some of the heroic traits of her pioneer mother, who came across the plains with the first band of immigrants in 1843.

In his seventieth year Henry Arthur Jones has begun writing for the "movies." For forty-two years he wrote plays for the vocal drama and for thirty years of that time was ranked with Pinero as one of England's greatest dramatists. Now, when he is nearly threescore and ten, and as if in rebuke to those who hold that a man is well within the "lean and slippered pantaloons" period by then, he has begun work all over again.

"I had 5 cents in my pocket and a piece of apple pie in my hand," said Professor M. I. Pupin of Columbia University, describing the circumstances of his arrival in America in the steerage of the steamship Westphalia, which plied between New York and Hamburg a half-century ago. Today that American scholar of Serbian birth modestly wears the scholastic affixes Ph. D., Sc. D., and LL. D., holds the chair in electro-mechanics at Columbia, and is secretary of the Interracial Council of New York, an organization which includes leading men from among thirty-two racial groups in America.

Only in rare moments does a listener remember that Rabindranath Tagore is one of a subject people, and that to him the gentle rule of Britain is still the domination of an alien race. Clad in flowing gray robe and facing as always the sun, Tagore is the embodiment of the Eastern savant to whom the Western world has been introduced in story and poetry. His flowing gray beard and his face, tanned a soft brown during the generations in which his ancestors faced the hot sun of his peninsula, and his black eyes, which glow with marvelous softness despite their unmistakable piercing qualities, give an interviewer a sense of unreality. When Tagore speaks this impression grows. His voice is high and soft, with an almost spirit-like quality. His language flows with rhythmic purity.

The dominating figure in all English thought is Lord Northcliffe. People continue to refer to him as the reincarnation of the Napoleonic mind. Indeed his army of editors, directing newspapers and magazines with immense circulations throughout all England, have all the appearances of the Napoleonic hordes. Individually, the Englishman is wearied of this strenuous character, but he has made and unmade prime ministers, and even today his thoughts are, curiously enough, the Englishman's thoughts with regard to their prime minister, Mr. Lloyd George. It is, again, simple when we realize that nearly every Englishman reads one of Lord Northcliffe's papers. Lord Northcliffe is naturally a character worth studying. He is a well-built, stocky, energetic man, extremely nervous but decisive in all his movements and speech. His face is complex, bearing all the lines of an intense thinker and a man of great mental activity. It is the face of a vain man, arrogantly conscious of his power, yet sincere, kindly, and sympathetic. His hair looks as though it were in perpetual need of combing and expresses certain disorderliness about this overworked man.

THE LETTERS OF WILLIAM JAMES.

Henry James Edits Two Biographical Volumes of His Father's Correspondence.

Private letters form the best of biographical material. Nothing throws so strong a light upon disposition and character as correspondence written without a view to publication, and therefore without the reserves that are ordinarily used to hide the privacies of the mind. But the task of the editor is a correspondingly hard one. In his duty of revelation he may cautiously invade the privacies but never the sanctities of life. He must give to the public no more than the public has a right to demand, and it has the right to demand much in the case of such a man as William James.

Mr. Henry James, son of the late William James has displayed all the virtues of the editor in these two volumes of his father's letters that reach us from the Atlantic Monthly Press. He tells us, and with obvious truth, that his father could not write a page that was not free, animated, and characteristic. James himself was a great reader of biographies, and he knew that every man's philosophy is biased by his feelings and is not due to purely rational processes. He had none of the cool kind of abstraction that comes from indifference to the issue. He was intensely interested in everything and of an insatiable curiosity. His own development was a matter of vivid personal experience.

James went to Berlin in 1867 partly in the interests of his health and partly to study physiology in the German laboratories. His letters from Dresden and Berlin have a peculiar interest at the present time, when so many minds are trying to trace the thread of cause and effect in recent events. Writing from Berlin to his sister on October 17, 1867, he tells us something of a love affair, although not, we may suppose, a very serious one:

I enclose you a photograph of an actress here with whom I am in love. A neat coiffure, is it not? I also send you a couple more of my own precious portraits. I got them taken to fulfill a promise I had made to a young Bohemian lady at Teplitz, the niece of the landlady. Sweet Anna Adamowicz (pronounce—vitch), which means descendant of Adam.—She belongs consequently to one of the very first families in Bohemia. I used to drive dull care away by writing her short notes in the Bohemian tongue such as: "Navzdý budes v me mysli Iroh m pamatku," i. e., forever bloomest thou in my memory;—"dej mne tojji bodo biznu," give me your photograph; and isolated phrases as "Máxik, Dicka, pritel, pritelkyne," i. e., Jungling, Mädchen, Freund, Freundin; "mi luja," I love, etc. These were carried to her by the chambermaid, and the style, a little more florid than was absolutely required by mere courtesy, was excused by her on the ground of my limited acquaintance with the subtleties of the language. Besides, the sentiments were on the whole good and the error, if any, in the right direction. When she gave me her photograph (which I regret to say she spelt "fotokraft"!!!!) she made me promise to send her mine. Hence mine.

The visit to Germany had been preceded by a trip to the Amazon as a member of the Thayer expedition led by Louis Agassiz. It was a memorable occasion, not only for its scientific importance, but for the association with Agassiz, an association that leads to many anecdotes in letters written by James to his parents. Thus on one occasion he writes, to his mother from the steamer at Rio:

The Prof. now sits opposite me with his face all aglow, holding forth to the Captain's wife about the imperfect education of the American people. He has talked uninterruptedly for a quarter of an hour at least. I know not how she reacts; I presume she feels somewhat flattered by the attention, however. This morning he made a characteristic speech to Mr. Billings, Mr. Watson's friend. Mr. B. had offered to lend him some books. Agassiz: "May I enter your stateroom and take them when I shall want them, sir?" Billings, extending his arm, said genially, "Sir, all that I have is yours!" To which Agassiz, far from being overcome, replied, shaking a monitory finger at the foolishly generous wight, "Look out, sir, dat I take not your skin!" That expresses very well the man. Offering your services to Agassiz is as absurd as it would be for a South Carolinian to invite General Sherman's soldiers to partake of some refreshment when they called at his house. . . .

James invariably prefers to praise rather than to blame, but he found little enough to praise in Berlin. He seems cordially to have disliked the people and their ways. In December, 1867, he writes to Henry Bowditch:

Berlin is a bleak and unfriendly place. The inhabitants are rude and graceless, but must conceal a solid worth beneath it. I only know seven of them, and they are of the élite. It is very hard getting acquainted with them, as you have to make all the advances yourself; and your antagonist shifts so between friendliness and a drill sergeant's formal politeness that you never know exactly on what footing you stand with him. These Prussians bow in the most amusing way you ever saw,—as if an invisible hand suddenly punched them in the abdomen and an equally invisible foot forthwith kicked them in the rear,—one time and two motions, and they do it 100 times a day.

James, we are told, was laboring under a sense of frustration and impotence during the period between his winter in Berlin and 1872. There can be no doubt that he himself experienced religious despondency as well as observing the distress of it in others. On page 160 of the "Varieties of Religious Experience" we find an authentic statement of his own case. He says:

Whilst in this state of philosophic pessimism and general depression of spirits about my prospects, I went one evening into a dressing-room in the twilight, to procure some article that was there; when suddenly there fell upon me without any warning, just as if it came out of the darkness, a horrible fear of my own existence. Simultaneously there arose in my mind the image of an epileptic patient whom I had seen in the asylum, a black-haired youth with greenish skin, entirely idiotic, who used to sit all day on one of the benches, or rather shelves, against the wall, with his knees drawn up against his chin, and the coarse gray undershirt, which was his only garment, drawn over them, inclosing his entire figure. He sat there like a sort of sculptured Egyptian cat or Peruvian mummy, moving nothing but his black eyes and looking absolutely non-human. This image and my fear entered into a species of combination with each other. That shape am I, I felt, potentially. Nothing that I possess can defend me against that fate, if the hour for it should strike for me as it struck for him. There was such a horror of him, and such a perception of my own merely momentary discrepancy from him, that it was as if something hitherto solid within my breast gave way entirely, and I became a mass of quivering fear. After this the universe was changed for me altogether. I awoke morning after morning with a horrible dread at the pit of my stomach, and with a sense of the insecurity of life that I never knew before, and that I have never felt since. It was like a revelation; and although the immediate feelings passed away, the experience has made me sympathetic with the morbid feelings of others ever since. It gradually faded, but for months I was unable to go out into the dark alone.

James was absorbedly interested in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870. He could hardly be otherwise, but he seems to have preserved a detached attitude, believing that much good might result, no matter how the struggle went. Writing to Mr. Bowditch in December, 1870, he says:

Your letter written from Leipzig just before the declaration of war reached me in the country. I have thought of you and of answering you, abundantly, ever since; but have mostly been prevented by sheer physical imbecillitas. Now I am ashamed of such a state, and shall write you a page or so a day till the letter is finished. I have had no idea all this time where or what you have been, traveler, student, or medical army officer. You may imagine how excited I was at the beginning of the war. I had not dared to hope for such a complete triumph of poetic justice as occurred. Now I feel much less interested in the success of the Germans, first because I think it's time that the principle of territorial conquest were abolished, second because success will redound to the credit of autocratic government there, and good as that may happen to be in the particular junctures, it's unsafe and pernicious in the long run. Moreover, if France succeeds in beating off the Germans now, I should think there would be some chance of the peace being kept between them hereafter—the French will have gained an insight they never had of the horrors of a war of conquest, and some degree of loathing for it in the abstract; and they will not have to fight to regain their honor. Moreover, I should like to see the republic succeed. But if Alsace and Lorraine be taken, there must be another war, for them and for honor. On the other hand, justice seems to demand a permanent penalty for the political immorality of France. So that there will be enough good to console one for the bad, whichever way it turns out. . . .

In August of 1882 James arranged with the college for a year's leave of absence, and sailed for Europe again, this time with the double purpose of giving himself a vacation and of meeting some of the European investigators who were working on the problems in which he had become absorbed:

He landed in England, and paused there just long enough to throw his brother Henry into the state of half-resentful bewilderment that invariably resulted from their first European reunions. Henry, to whom Europe, and England in particular, had already become an absorbing passion and for whom American reactions upon Europe were still an unexhausted theme, greeted every arriving American with eager curiosity and a confident expectation that the stranger would "register" impressions of the most charming enchantment and pleasure for his edification. William, on the other hand, was always most under the European spell when in America; and—whether moved by the constitutional restlessness that seized him so soon as ever he began to travel, or by the perversity that was a fascinating trait in his character and was usually provoked by his younger brother's admiring neighborhood—he was always most ardently American when on European soil. Thus his first words of greeting to Henry on stepping out of the steamer train were! "My!—how cramped and inferior England seems! After all, it's poor old Europe, just as it used to be in our dreary boyhood! America may be raw and shrill, but I could never live with this as you do! I'm going to hurry down to Switzerland for wherever I then home again as soon as may be. It was a mistake to come over! I thought it would do me good. Hereafter I'll stay at home. You'll have to come to America if you want to see the family."

Every one knows that James was greatly interested in psychic research, partly from a sense of resentment of the boycott against it which was the prevailing tendency of scientific men everywhere. But he was by no means credulous and also by no means lacking in a sense of humor, as shown by his adventures with a medium known as Mme. D.—. He says:

[Apr. 6.] Hodgson and I started after our baggage arrived, to find Mr. B.—, who, you may have seen by the papers, is making a scandal by having given himself over (hand and foot) to a medium, "Madam D.—," who does most extraordinarily described physical performances. We found the old girl herself, a type for Alexandre Dumas, obese, wicked, jolly, intellectual, with no end of go and animal spirits, who entertained us for an hour, gave us an appointment for a sitting on Monday, and asked us to come and see Mr. B. tonight. What will come of it all I don't know. It will be baffling, I suppose, like everything else of that kind.

[Apr. 7.] Mr. B. and Mrs. D. were "too tired" to see us last night! I suspect that will be the case next Monday. It is the knowing thing to do under the circumstances. But that woman is one with whom one would fall wildly in love, if in love at all—she is such a fat, fat old villain. . . .

[Apr. 24th.] In bed at 11:30, after the most hideously inept physical night, in Charleston, over a much-praised female medium who fraudulently played on the guitar. A plague take all white-livered, anemic, flaccid, weak-voiced Yankee frauds! Give me a full-blooded, red-lipped villain like dear old D.—when shall I look upon her like again?

Writing to Carl Stumpf in January, 1886, James expresses his opinion of scientists who refuse to investigate psychic phenomena on the ground that they are "impossible":

I don't know whether you have heard of the London "Society for Psychic Research," which is seriously and laboriously investigating all sorts of "supernatural" matters, clairvoyance, apparitions, etc. I don't know what you think of such work; but I think that the present condition of opinion regarding it is scandalous, there being a mass of testimony, or apparent testimony, about such things, at which the only men capable of critical judgment—men of scientific education—will not even look. We have founded a similar society here within the year,—some of us thought that the publications of the London society deserved at least to be treated as if worthy of experimental disproof,—and although work advances very slowly owing to the small amount of disposable time on the part of the members, who are all very busy men, we have already stumbled on some rather inexplicable facts out of which something may come. It is a field in which the sources of deception are extremely numerous. But I believe there is no source of deception in the investigation of nature which can compare with a fixed belief that certain kinds of phenomenon are impossible.

James had trustful ways that sometimes led him into difficulties. If he tried to swap horses he was liable to get the worst of the bargain. The editor says with regard to one such transaction:

Such enterprises as the horse-swapping just alluded to were not always conducted with that circumspection which marks your true horse-trader. The companion of one search for a horse reported James as accosting a man whom he met driving along the road and asking, "Do you know any one who wants to sell a horse?" At Chocorua every one was willing to sell a horse, and accordingly the man answered that he "didn't know as he did," but what might James be ready to pay? James replied that he was looking for a horse "for about $150, but might pay $175." There was a pause before the man spoke: "I've got a horse in my barn that would be just what you want—for one hundred and seventy-five."

Some of the most delightful of the James letters were written to his sons William and Henry. A letter to the former dated April, 1888, tells of some seals that he watched in a tank at Boston. He says:

First, the learned seals in a big tank of water in Boston. The loveliest beasts, with big black eyes, poking their heads up and down in the water, and then scrambling out on their bellies like boys tied up in bags. They play the guitar and banjo and organ, and one of them saves the life of a child who tumbles in the water, catching him by the collar with his teeth, and swimming him ashore. They are both, child and seal, trained to do it. When they have done well, their master gives them a lot of fish. They eat an awful lot, scales, and fins, and bones and all, without chewing. That is the worst thing about them. He says he never heats them. They are full of curiosity—more so than a dog for far-off things; for when a man went round the room with a pole pulling down the windows at the top, all their heads bobbed out of the water and followed him about with their eyes au lunter curiosity. Dogs would hardly have noticed him, I think. Now, speaking of dogs, Jap was nauseated two days ago. I thought, from his licking his nose, that he was going to be sick, and got him out of doors just in time. He vomited most awfully on the grass. He then acted as if he thought I was going to punish him, poor thing. He can't discriminate between sickness and sin.

James frequently reverts to his psychic convictions and conclusions.

In July, 1891, we find him writing to his sister on the subject of death and of the mental inhibitions that obstruct our highest powers during life:

These inhibitions, these split-up selves, all these new facts that are gradually coming to light about our organization, these enlargements of the self in trance, etc., are bringing me to turn for light in the direction of all sorts of despised spiritualistic and unscientific ideas. Father would find in me today a much more receptive listener—all that philosophy has got to be brought in. . . . And what a queer contradiction comes to the ordinary scientific argument against immortality (based on body being mind's condition and mind going out when body is gone), when one must believe (as now, in these neuritic cases) that some infernality in the body prevents really existing parts of the mind from coming to their effective rights at all, suppresses them, and blots them out from participation in this world's experiences, although they were there all the time. When that which is you passes out of the body, I am sure that there will be an explosion of liberated force and life till then eclipsed and kept down. I can hardly imagine your transition without a great oscillation of both "worlds" as they regain their new equilibrium after the change! Every one will feel the shock, but you yourself will be more surprised than anybody else.

The foregoing extracts are confined to the first of these two fascinating volumes. They will suffice to show the biographical treat in store for the reader.

THE LETTERS OF WILLIAM JAMES. Edited by his son, Henry James. In two volumes. Boston: The Atlantic Monthly Press; $10.

It is said that near Thompson Falls, in Montana, there exists a well whence issues a steady flow of air. During the hottest days of summer, it is reported, the temperature of this curious well never rises above 35 degrees. The man owning this well has put it to a good use, for over it he has built a small refrigerating house in which to keep the food for family use. From the well to his store he has also laid a pipe, and through this comes the damp air of the well. The end of the pipe opens into a refrigerating room of the store, so that this man needs no ice to keep his perishable merchandise in the best of condition always. It seems that the well is not a natural one; that it was dug for the purpose of supplying water, but that when bottom was reached, instead of water, the air came forth with considerable force. In winter there is no appreciable lowering of the temperature. The result is that the owner of the well can use both storerooms for taking care of goods that otherwise would be likely to freeze.

That the savages of prehistoric America knew the use of splints in the treatment of fractures is revealed by examination of the skeleton of a young woman recently found in the pueblo ruins of New Mexico. An arm, badly broken in two places, was enclosed by six carefully made splints of wood.

A race of 40,000 head-hunting cannibals declared to be the smallest human beings, as a race, was recently discovered by an explorer in the New Hebrides.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending December 11, 1920, were $139,500,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $169,400,000; a decrease from last year of $29,900,000.

The Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco's gold reserve showed a slight decline during the week ended December 10th. The holdings here and abroad amounted to $175,062,000, a decrease of $2,638,000 since December 3d.

Oakland bank clearings for the week ending Thursday, December 9, 1920, showed an increase of $2,593,812.60 over the corresponding week of last year, according to the figures reported to the Oakland Chamber of Commerce by the Oakland Clearing House Association.

Not less than $250,000,000 of worthless and fraudulent securities are sold annually to the American people. Indeed Mr. John H. Mason, president of the Commercial Trust Company of Philadelphia, feels certain from his experience in the Treasury Department at Washington "that if we could obtain accurate statistics it would be a markedly greater amount." It is with the hope of eliminating all or part of the loss thus brought upon the community that Mr. Mason has accepted the presidency in the great mass of the public who have only a hazy idea of Wall Street, of investment banking, of stocks, bonds, etc.

"Recently one of the foremost men in America, a man of very great talent whose fame is international, was sued by two men in connection with a stock-floating affair. A representative of this newspaper wrote to an associate of a man of international reputation that one of the two persons bringing the suit, and who poses as a banker and broker, had a criminal record, having been in prison twice on charges of swindling. The newspaper man got a reply to this effect: 'Much obliged. The other fellow is a crook, too.'

"What are you to think when an associate of men high in industry and high in finance is plucked by sharpers just as are clergymen, physicians, widows, the many who have comparatively little money and little knowledge of stocks, but who have the foolish notion that possibly they will be favored by fortune? This 'get-rich-quick' business has its foundation in the belief that a majority of persons are fools. If you are wise you will consult your banker when it comes to investments. If you do any investigating do it before putting in your money.

"Mr. Mason says it is with the hope of eliminating all or part of this 'get-rich-quick' swindling in Philadelphia that he has accepted the presidency of the Better Business Bureau. Philadelphia has approximately 2 per cent. of the population of the United States. Accepting his estimate of $250,000,000, Philadelphians have been mulcted to the extent of $5,000,000 a year. You can wipe Philadelphia off the 'sucker list' if you will."

As the falling prices of commodities bring the industrial stocks down close to pre-war levels railroad stocks in sympathy join in the downward activity. For, as may easily be conceived, the closing of industrial plants to a point of about one-third of their capacity is not helping railroad earnings. However, this condition is not going to last, and as the Iron Age predicts that 1921 will witness the greatest demand for railroad equipment ever seen in this country, one may look ahead a few months to the time when our factories will be running again at 100 per cent. capacity turning out greater quantities of goods with 30 per cent. less labor. Reports from industrial centres show without exception that the individual efficiency of their employees is increasing materially. Take, for example, the Ford plant. With 6000 fewer men than it had ninety days ago, the production records of this plant were broken during the week ending November 27th.

The prosperity of the United States is closely identified with that of its railroads. The year of 1919 witnessed a remarkable rise in the stock market. The aftermath of all such bull markets is invariably a stock panic such as we have just had in 1920; therefore the law of action and reaction suggests that 1921 will show a decided upturn. Dow, Jones & Co. (Wall Street Journal) averages of twenty rails and industrials show the stock market thoroughly liquidated. In the 1914 and 1917 stock panic liquidation ended in December. The end of the present downward trend is no doubt also at hand. To the investor who has faith in railroad stocks let me recommend Union Pacific, Southern Pacific, and Atchison. The industrial list is filled with bargains showing present net yields to be from 10 per cent. to 14 per cent. per annum. Bargain hunters who ordinarily pay no attention to the stock market are now out in force, buying stocks on the bargain counter and taking them out of the Street. The floating supply of stocks will gradually be lessened until some day the market will start to rise and we will again be in a "bull market."

The formation of a foreign trade corporation has now been effected. 1921 will show this country doing business in Europe on the largest scale ever before witnessed. Do not wait until our industrial plants are running at full capacity and then expect to buy stocks and make money in the market. Buy now and put them away. Sell later when prosperity reigns supreme. Take, for example, the stock of the Studebaker Corporation. Range of stock in 1919 was 45 3/4 low to 151 high. Now selling at $42 per share. The dividend rate, 7 per cent. on par, which is $100, nets at present levels 16.7 per cent. Read the following facts regarding this great corporation, which has a record of seventy years of business integrity:

The Studebaker Company has more than discounted any adverse conditions surrounding the automobile industry. The third quarter for 1920 shows larger gross returns than for either of the two preceding quarters of the year. Sales for the three months ending September 30th were $27,823,611. Did you know that Studebaker earned more for the first nine months of 1920 than during the whole of 1919?

The net profits for the first nine months of 1920, after deduction for Federal taxes, were $9,765,851. This is equivalent to $15.34 per share on the $60,000,000 common stock.

Did you know that this company made in the year ending December 31, 1919, net profits of $28.54 per share? This was on $30,000,000 common stock then outstanding.

The total current assets as per statement of September 30, 1920, were $40,083,793, and current liabilities were $13,441,990, this leaving a net working capital of $26,641,803.

Buy it now and hold it indefinitely. This company will be in business for another seventy years without a doubt. Their new light six is meeting with popular favor and sales are steadily increasing.

Do you know that oil companies are all showing earnings beyond those of 1919, regardless of the fall in prices of other commodities?

I wish to call special attention to the present position of Mexican Petroleum—its great intrinsic value, its enormous and rapidly increasing earning power, and its magnificent prospects. My opinion is based upon the official statement by E. F. Doheny, president of the company, which was published in the Wall Street Journal of November 24th. Mr. Doheny stated that the company was then producing and moving 110,000 barrels of oil per day; that its October production was 3,500,000 barrels, this being the record month for the company. He said that about December 4th a new pipe line will begin delivering oil from the new well in Zacamixtle field, which had an initial flow of 87,000 barrels per day; that by January 1st the company's capacity from new pipe lines completed and in operation will be between 125,000 and 135,000 barrels daily, and that by June 1st next two other pipe lines having a minimum capacity of 65,000 barrels per day will give the company a shipping capacity of 200,000 barrels daily.

From information at hand I estimate that the company's earnings are at present running at the rate of $5,000,000 per month, equal to $60,000,000 per annum, or at the annual rate of about $130 per share net before taxes. This is within $35 per share of its present market price and makes no allowance for the steady increase which will be made both in amount of production and in earnings resulting from contracts made at higher selling prices during the next six months.

In addition to earning power, there are a number of other reasons why Mexican Petroleum stock is an unusual bargain at anything under $200 per share. These reasons are: (1) The majority of this stock is in the treasury of the Pan-American Petroleum and Transport Company. I estimate that this percentage is now between 75 and 80, leaving something like 100,000 shares in the hands of large holders and the public. Of this, about half is held by large stockholders, leaving only about 50,000 shares available in the market. (2) The process of absorption into the Pan-American treasury is constantly reducing the floating supply, so that the time is rapidly approaching when the stock will be extremely scarce.

The action of this stock indicates that it is cornered. Subscribers should continue to hold this stock and Pan-American. Remember that Mexican Petroleum in 1919 sold up to $264 per share and has since then doubled its production. This stock is undoubtedly the leader of the New York stock market.—W. C. Not less than $250,000,000 of worthless and fraudulent securities are sold annually to the American people. Indeed Mr. John H. Mason, president of the Commercial Trust Company of Philadelphia, feels certain from his experience in the Treasury Department at Washington "that if we could obtain accurate statistics it would be a markedly greater amount." It is with the hope of eliminating all or part of the loss thus brought upon the community that Mr. Mason has accepted the presidency

"The estimate of $250,000,000 a year is moderate. The sale of worthless 'securities' is an 'industry' in America. It would not be if the public exercised common sense in financial investments.

"Any time a suave and glib-tongued person offers opportunity to you to make large profit by buying stock in something or other the chances are one hundred to one you will get stung if you part with your money. cable system connecting the Fatherland with all the German colonies, utilizing for landing stations the territory of non-European states or countries which might be expected to maintain neutrality in the event of a struggle involving the great powers. Four privately owned but heavily subsidized cable companies had completed the laying of about 23,000 miles of cables and Germany had developed a cable manufacturing industry which made her practically independent of Great Britain in this respect.

"Two German cables spanned the Atlantic written by the Dutch and German governments. There existed also a German cable from Emden to Vigo in Spain, from Emden to Brest, and a line in the Black Sea from Constantinople to Constanza.

"Under the reparations section of the Treaty of Versailles, Germany was compelled to renounce on her own behalf and on behalf of her nationals all rights to the effective portion of these cables. The allocation of the former German lines in the Pacific or in the North Atlantic to the United States would be a most valuable addition to the American cable system.

"Through the seizure of one of the Atlantic cables formerly owned by the Deutsche-Atlantische Telegraphengesellschaft, the British system now encircles the globe. British interests own and operate more than half of the cables now in use. Between Europe and the Far East, Africa and South America, the British control of world communications is most clearly indicated. The Eastern Telegraph Company, a British corporation, controls both the direct routes which remain open between western Europe and the Orient. The French African cable reaches directly only certain of the French possessions on the west African coast and the remainder of that continent is dependent upon the Eastern Telegraph Company's lines."

The hank explain the location and importance of the former German lines connecting Shanghai, Guam, and the Island of Yap, which have attracted special attention at the conference.

"The longest and in some respects the most important American cable," the bank says, "is the Commercial Pacific Cable Company's line from San Francisco to Manila, via Honolulu, Midway Island, and Guam, all American possessions. At Manila it connects with the lines of the Eastern Telegraph Company to Hongkong, Shanghai, and Japanese points. From Guam a branch runs to the Island of Bonin, where it connects with the Japanese government cable at Tokyo. At Guam also it connects with the line of the Deutsche-Niederlandische Telegraphengesellschaft to Yap, whence the Germany company had lines to Shanghai and to Menado, and thence to Borneo and Java, with connections to India and other points. This German cable formerly furnished an alternative route to Shanghai and other points and could be used when interruptions occurred on the American Line between Guam and Manila.

"The Japanese cable system consists of lines connecting the various islands which comprise the Japanese Empire, of a line to the Japanese possessions of Taiwan and Chosen and of cables between Nagasaki and Shanghai and Port Arthur, as well as a line from Taiwan to the Chinese mainland. There is also a line to the Island of Bonin connecting with the American transpacific cable.

"The most acute need for additional cable facilities at the present time is in the Pacific Ocean. While over the north Atlantic cable traffic has practically quadrupled since 1913, in the same period Pacific cable traffic has increased nearly ninefold. On account of the great distance between the Pacific ports of the United States and the Asiatic centres of commerce, much of our business with the Far East must be done by cable. The Department of Commerce estimates that the cable plays a part in as much as 85 per cent. of our transactions with the Orient."

E. H. Rollins & Sons and the Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company are participating in the offer of $220,000 Coast Valleys Gas and Electric Company collateral trust ten-year 8 per cent. gold notes. These notes are a direct obligation of the company and are secured by a deposit with the trustee of the company's first mortgage 6 per cent. bonds at the ratio of $3000 bonds to $2000 notes. Bonds of this mortgage issue have been certified as a legal investment for California savings banks. The Coast Valleys Gas and Electric Company, incorporated in March, 1912, owns electric, gas, and water properties and operates without competition in Monterey, Salinas, Pacific Grove, Carmel, King City, and other towns in the Salinas Valley and adjacent territory. It serves a rich agricultural section susceptible of great development and in which the demand for electric energy is constantly increasing. The proceeds of this note issue are to be expended for the acquisition of additional property and for the construction and completion of extensions and improvements of its facilities.

Arizona Cotton Growers' Corporation of Arizona is offering an issue of $5,000,000 common stock (no preferred stock authorized or to be issued) par value of units $1, non-assessable and authorized by the corporation commissioner of California. The first unit of $200,000 to be realized from sale of securities before any part of the amount can be used.

The purpose of this issue is to provide funds for the initial steps incident to developing lands now controlled in the Casa Grande Valley, Arizona. Development will be completed and crops will be planted, harvested, and put on the market with the funds realized from the sale of the balance of the stock.

Funds secured from the sale of stock will be held in trust until the first unit of 200,000 shares is sold. Payments will then be made on the land now held under options. This system of purchasing enables the corporation to secure land at a surprisingly low figure.

Concerns which make a specialty of reclamation will handle all the development work. Here again the advantage of a corporation is evident, for these immense contracts will be made at very favorable figures.

The expert business men at the head of the corporation will direct crop production through experienced men of the cotton lands. Marketing will be the special task of these business men, and it is here that their commercial experience will be very effective.

The land now held under option by the Arizona Cotton Growers' Corporation lies in the Casa Grande Valley of Arizona. Some 40,000 acres in and around Toltec, which the corporation controls, comprises part of the most fertile land of the valley.

Plenty of water for irrigation is assured through wells tapping the subterranean flow. The soil is very deep and much of it closely resembles the soil of the Mississippi Valley.

A profit of $125 per acre is the conservative average determined by a careful compilation of all available reports received from representative farmers of the Salt River Valley, Arizona. In many instances the profit German commercial expansion in South America was served by a cable from Monrovia to Pernambuco, Brazil. Idling in Italy.

Joseph Collins' new book of Italian inspiration, "Idling in Italy," has the admirable purpose of introducing English readers to Italian, particularly modern Italian, literature. The first seven chapters fulfill this aim thoroughly, but the reader is at loss to know why the remaining essays are bound in the same volume. Their only link seems to be that they were written in Italy, a literary looseness provided for evidently by the legend on the title-page, "I loaf and invite my soul."

Probably the motto serves as an additional excuse for interlarding a serious argument with sapient superfluities, reminiscent of the most copious Victorian writers.

The latter half of the book, written though it is in an annoyingly affected style that literally disregards philological laws, has some provoking chapters that show a level and unbiased mind.

If Mr. Collins were not hampered by a style, partly deliberate in its badness, that indulges in such word-perversions as "obstacled," "rememberable," "agonal," and a score of others, and partly, no doubt, unconscious of the tenets of English word-order and metaphor, his writings would be an acceptable contribution to the field of the English essay. Certainly clear thinking is the foundation of a worth while essay, but charm of style is an important heritage from all the great essayists of our language. And a charming style can not be obtained by ignoring the genius of the English tongue.—R. G.

THE ENEMIES OF WOMEN

Is there anything stronger than the appeal a woman has for a man?

Blasco Ibanez finds the self-sufficiency of the male routed all along the line. In his Alicia he has concentrated all the restless fascination of the female of the species as she was found in the old Europe of the pre-war days. But how the lure of sex may in great crises become a regenerator of character is shown in this new volume which does for the war's ideals what "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" did for the war as a conflict of material forces.

Memories of a British Traveler.

The fine old art of writing personal reminiscences seems still to have its home on the English side of the Atlantic. Witness a volume of "Memories," by Lord Redesdale, or, rather, two volumes, just issued from the press of Dutton & Co.

Lord Redesdale began traveling at the "marble age" of boyhood, and ended it only when he had so far advanced in years that he could say in his introduction: "Now that the midnight of life is at hand, before the last chime of the curfew must ring out, I have been busying myself in writing down memories of the people who brightened its morning, its noon, and its evening."

The "marble age" was spent in France, most of it in Paris during the winter and spring, but "never twice in the same apartments." Recurring to this period and speaking of his playmates, Lord Redesdale says: "I have forgotten the names of all of them save only one called Jules—I suppose he had a surname, but if he did I never knew it—he was always 'le petit Jules.' He was of about my own age, very small, but of quite a demonic cleverness, and at marbles he was a hero. . . . I remember one tragic episode of a beautiful white alley with rosy pink veins, the pride of my soul. The little villain challenged me to play him, offering to stake a superb agate against it. In less time than it takes to write the tale the alley was his. My beautiful white alley! I was but seven years old and I wept bitterly. I wonder whether 'le petit Jules,' if he is yet alive, remembers how he avenged Waterloo that day in his victory over the English boy."

In middle life Lord Redesdale was attached in various capacities to the British diplomatic and consular service in the Orient and lived at Peking and Tokyo when Japan was first being opened to foreigners. His description of the first reception ever accorded to aliens by the Mikado is typical of the contents of his book. He observes:

"As we entered the room the Son of Heaven rose and acknowledged our bows. He was at that time a tall youth with a bright eye and clear complexion; his demeanor was very dignified, well becoming the heir of a dynasty many centuries older than any other sovereignty on the face of the globe. He was dressed in a white cloak with long padded trousers of crimson silk trailing like a lady's court train. His headdress was the same as that of his courtiers, though as a rule it was surmounted by a long, stiff, flat plume of black gauze. I call it a plume for want of a better name, but there was nothing feathery about it. His eyebrows were shaved off and painted in high up on the forehead; his cheeks were rouged and his lips painted with red and gold. His teeth were blackened. It was no small feat to look dignified under such a travesty of nature; but the sangre Azul would not be denied."

Many years later this much-traveled statesman was a guest of the famous Italian hero, Garibaldi. An incident of his visit is thus set forth: "When I put out my candle, hoping to sleep, then I realized that I was not alone. The dust was literally full of fleas; they attacked me in battalions; I slew them by the score, but their widows and orphans and brothers came on undismayed, undefeated, to avenge their death. Never save once, in the Cave of the Seven Sleepers at Ephesus, where I had taken refuge from a storm, did I see such an army of hungry cohorts. I tried to comfort myself by thinking of Eothen's famous chapter and Thackeray's 'White Squall,' when

All the fleas in Jewry Began to bite like fury, but it was all in vain. I prayed for the morning, which was long in coming."

More About Versailles.

"The fact that the need for economic revival was more fundamental than that for political revival was not appreciated by the political men who made the peace."

This is the central theme of a "hastily constructed" book by the newspaper correspondent, John Foster Bass, of the Chicago News on "The Peace Tangle." The book was issued professedly for use in the presidential campaign which has just closed.

A secondary theme of the work is that the "political men" who made the treaty did not see even that different political adjustments were necessary than would have been under the economic conditions of 1914.

There is not a great deal that is profoundly important in Mr. Bass' volume, but it has at least the merit of being "newsy" and of presenting bare facts without the customary obfuscations of diplomatic argument. France's bald determination "to keep Germany weak," England's and Italy's pressure for Germany's early economic rehabilitation, the refusal of the old problems of Asia Minor and of the control of the trade routes to India to submit to settlement, the present beggared condition of Austria, the "economic errors" in the treaty of peace with Hungary, and many other interesting phases of the aftermath of the Treaty of Versailles are described by Mr. Bass with very excellent impartiality and timeliness. On the whole the publication seems to be justified.

Archaic England.

The author of "Archaic England" has discarded the usual archaeological method of fitting evidence to theory and has professedly discarded all theories or working hypotheses to start with. He will go wherever his materials or data take him, and no farther.

Applying the so-called jig-saw system, he discovers patterns that are usually refused reconstruction by archaeologists. Many of the theories that result are radical, but there is no reason why archaeology may not have its radicals as well as art or politics. Two or three centuries or even one century ago artists and critics would have been loud in declaiming any one so hardy as to produce an impressionistic painting or sculpture. And yet the greatest of modern sculptors—Rodin—has made impressionism orthodox.

So it may well be that Mr. Bayley is on the right road when he insists on drawing conclusions from the similarity of Old Celtic and Hebrew; when he finds evidence of early relationship between Scots and Etrurians; and when he forwards the theory, for which he gives exhaustive evidence, that the early Celts of Britain were in some inexplicable way connected with the Phoenicians—and this last in the face of the authorities who say the historical evidence for such connections has been weighed and found wanting. Disregarding historical evidence and its fallacies, Mr. Bayley sets to work to collect in the chapter, "A Tale of Troy," all the archaic and philological evidence in the case. And a very impressive array it makes.

However, the author is sometimes over-enthusiastic in matching the pieces of his puzzle. His mind has gotten so in the habit of classifying words of similar sound that it sometimes seems to work mechanically. A point in case is the paragraph on names of flowers where he says, ". . . the pansy was in all probability deemed to be Pan's eye." It is improbable that this meaning was ever attached to pansy, which is merely bad French for pensée. According to Mactierlinck, the flower was not introduced into Europe till the seventeenth century. Another instance of Mr. Bayley's allowing his hobby to ride him into a ditch is his deriving speculum from speck, O. E. for spook, on the assumption that the first reflection was mistaken for a spook. There is little reason for assuming that the numerous Latin words deriving from the root spee, including speculum, had anything to do with spooks. Is it not more probable to assume that a spook was called a speck because it was "a thing seen"?

These points are noted, however, as a warning against taking single philological resemblances too literally, when using the jig-saw system, and are not meant as an arraignment of that system. The taking of all one's material and drawing conclusions therefrom is the only scientific approach we have as yet for attacking a subject that is not yet a science.—R. G.

Archaic England. By Harold Bayley. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $7.50.

One of the odd trades of Birmingham is that of artificial eyemaking (says the London Daily Mail). It has never been more thriving than now. Some makers have three months' work ahead. The war added to the demand, and there are thousands of ex-service men who can not possibly be supplied for a considerable time. The variety of artificial eyes is surprising. They differ in the size of the iris, shape, and the color of the "white." No two eyes are alike, and the artificial eye has to match the remaining one, a matter of nice judgment. Formerly the Germans competed in the trade, but their "eyes" had many faults.

Let Your Child Discover the World For Himself

Curiosity is the great Educator! Through curiosity Columbus discovered America. Every child has the capacity to discover a new world, if you will help him. He pipes all hands on deck in the morning, and starts out on his voyage of discovery. Whether he finds out anything new; whether he brings any real treasure into port at night—any cargo which is worth while, all depends upon you. He must not be allowed to drift aimlessly along shore, but given some definite point to reach.

Every hour of every day must be made to count in the education of your child, and he can take with him on his daily voyages no guide so valuable as THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE, no friend so wise and so helpful, no companion better loved. It is the world of knowledge, so successfully arranged, so beautifully explained, so fascinatingly illustrated that it never fails to capture the mind of a child or an adult, for that matter.

PLACE THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE IN YOUR HOME TODAY!

The Book of Knowledge The Children's Encyclopaedia

10,000 STRIKING EDUCATIONAL PICTURES 350 COLORED PLATES COMPLETE INDEX

A Work of Genius

What is it that makes all the children, little and big, and even the grown-ups, fall under the spell of THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE, so that they love it like a human companion? There are many reasons, but chief among them these: First, the 10,000 striking educational pictures, which arrest and hold the child's attention. Second, the plain and simple language in which the descriptions are written, whether of the pictures or the brief articles which explain them. Third, the three different ways of telling the same things—by pictures, by articles, by summary. Fourth, the strong appeal to the child's heart and imagination, which is the best reason of all. It is the first work of reference which the children ever really enjoyed reading. It is a work of genius and a work of art as well as a little encyclopaedia which gives the important information of the world in the simplest and most delightful form. It is the simplest form of Universal Knowledge.

Opens the Doors of Knowledge

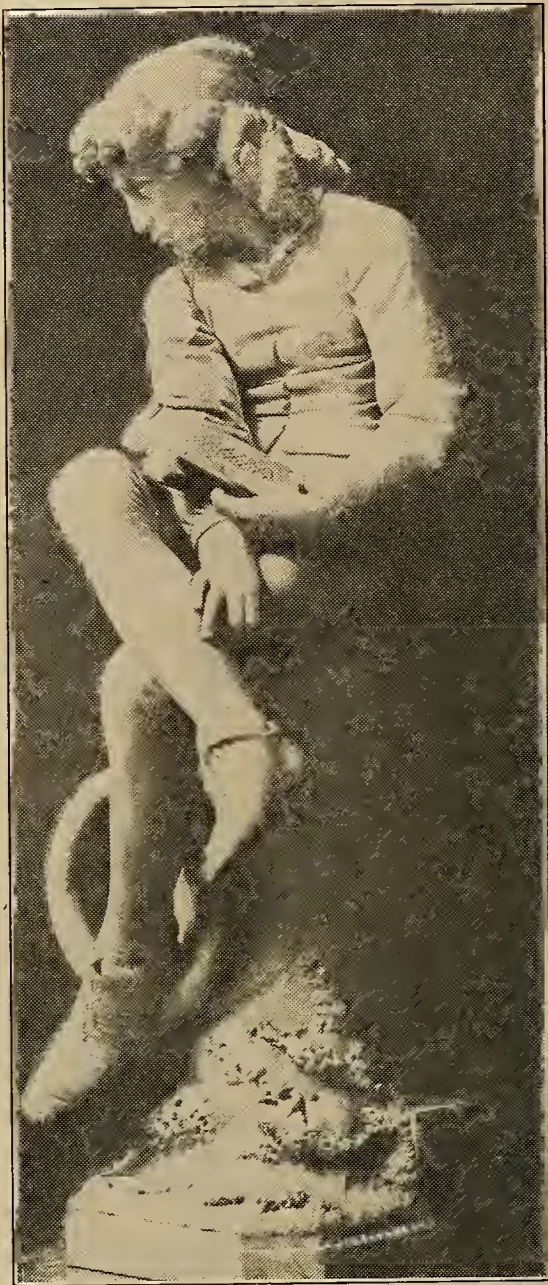

There is for every child some undiscovered country where he will be entirely at home, some open door which he will eagerly enter. The 16 Great Departments, Nature, Science, History, Biography, Astronomy, Physiology, Art, Literature, Poetry, Gardening, Carpentry, and Things to Make and to Do, are the open doors for his choosing. Place the BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE in your home and watch which of them he will open first. Persistence and Pleasure are the signs to look for here. You can not "forcibly feed" the child's mind, but you can give it a chance to find its own natural food.

Let us take the breakfast table and see what we can find out about it in THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE. There are many striking pictures such as "The Making of Bread and Butter"; "The Manufacture of Knives, Forks and Spoons"; "How We Obtain Coffee and Tea"; and "Where the Fruit Comes From," or you will learn where that delicious codfish was caught, and how from a fresh fish it became salt and was packed up in barrels and packages. The brief but fascinating descriptions of such subjects as these written in simple and plain language hold the child's attention almost as strongly as the pictures themselves.

BOOK MAILED FREE

The FREE BOOK contains 82 pages, 140 pictures, the contents of all the great departments, and 350 questions answered in the Wonder Section, and a number of brief articles showing the method of teaching the child most difficult subjects quickly and easily. SAN FRANCISCO MUST ANALYZE.

Supreme Essential Is Realization of Position in World Trade.

By MARSHALL DILL.

The cessation of the war and the consequent change in everything American from a trade standpoint should cause every municipality and even the nation itself to try and analyze the new relationship between this nation and its individual districts with the rest of the world.

Over 350 years ago the world's centre of trade shifted from the Mediterranean to Holland and then finally drifted into the hands of England and France. Two and a half centuries ago those nations, comprising the north-western section of Europe, discovered that it was necessary and vital to their existence as maritime nations to encourage and enter into a large way barter and trade with foreign countries. Under the influence of the exploitation of the East and West Indies, England, France, and Holland began to sew up their future destiny in maritime activities. Their young men went into the Orient and South America. They established their banks and branch houses abroad. They sent their money to their colonies. They so re-created themselves that foreign trade became the very lifeblood of their national life. An attack upon the foreign trade of these nations of Europe and the endeavor to deprive them of any part of it would be similar to the drawing of the blood from the veins of a man.

Quite different to Europe's activity in this regard has been the history of the United States prior to the war. One hundred years ago this country was a small struggling community with a few million inhabitants concerned with their domestic problems, endeavoring to preserve the unity of their new confederation. In their progress their problems remained internal and in the direction of their own West. The United States, from the very vastness of its territory and the richness of its internal values, became concerned with agriculture, mining, timber production, development of water power, and all those things which are built up from the interior of a nation.

A brief four years of warfare has converted this nation with its pre-war problems into an entirely different kind of an organization. A vast merchant fleet, equal to that of Great Britain, has been created and must be properly utilized. Our factories have doubled or tripled their overhead and production so that today their normal output is far in excess of ordinary American consumption. The United States has been forced out of its provincialism and thrown ruthlessly into the world marts. Her lack of training, the necessity of creating organizations to maintain foreign contact, and America's general feebleness abroad bring forcibly to the minds of thinking people the fact that active steps must be taken to foster, protect, and exploit America's new position. We can not expect that our Federal government, comprising 75 per cent. of its representation in Congress from interior districts, can at a moment's notice set up and organize tremendous propaganda divisions to help maintain her foreign position in the same way that England and France and the other nations have been accustomed to doing for many years. It therefore becomes absolutely necessary that the cities and districts themselves do whatever is in their power to advertise themselves in those fields which have their greatest appeal.

San Francisco is in a peculiar position. Nothing has ever been done in its history outside of the individual activities of corporations and firms here to attract foreign trade to itself, or to advertise itself abroad. San Francisco has been too well satisfied with those things that came to it unsolicited. No longer, however, will this city be the recipient of unsolicited favors. The Panama Canal has placed New York close to the Orient. Young competitive cities to the north have made themselves heard by active work to the disadvantage of this city. Other attractive harbors and trade organizations have been founded on this Coast and all these things combined have and will further take from this city and harbor those things which have come to us in the past by commercial gravity. All over the world tremendous activity, representing billions of dollars of investment, is being inaugurated whereby nations, districts, and cities are throwing themselves into the battle of competitive commerce. One organization has been created in England which represents in its membership over four billion dollars' investment, and they have established in behalf of themselves in practically every city in the world personal representatives to foster their own affairs. One city on the Pacific Coast that we have not generally regarded as a serious competitor in foreign affairs, and not even boasting a salt water harbor, has, we understand on excellent authority, created a fund of a million dollars and is now sending men into various parts of the Orient exploiting the port and advertising the city by personal contact.

The Orient and South America present peculiar temperamental and national problems. With these people the personal touch sometimes brings about a result far more important than cold print or impersonal figures.

Right here it is well to call the attention of the reader to the fact that foreign trade is without a doubt the highest thing in our nation today. The firm or man who indulges in actual foreign trade is the smallest part of its general scheme. In other words, in this city there is not a single individual whose welfare and future is not more or less directly influenced by the utilization of our harbor. Real estate is the basis of our values, and real estate depends upon this city as a port. If we were to build a fence across our docks and alienate the city from the ocean, what would become of our real estate values? We could very easily see ourselves converted into an interior town. Without the influence of this port, of what value would be those wonderful and beautiful buildings that have been erected for the housing of all classes of commercial activity? Where would they receive their tenants? What effect would this have on our department stores and retail establishments? Take our vast transportation investment; it would never have been here were it not for our harbor. So that after everything has been said, it is San Francisco Bay that shows itself to be the basis of our advancement and our position in the world.

If all these things are true it is very clear that our greater asset must be coddled and exploited. In doing this and adopting a modern method, that method must be based upon a very clear conception of what this city fundamentally consists. The biggest factor in the direction of trade to this district is lacking, that is, manufacturing and production. The greater consumption in the Orient is represented, first, in the shipment of steel with its many corollary items; second, in the supply of machinery, then cotton, drugs, chemicals, and a long list of American manufactured merchandise with all its ramifications. The centre of the production of these products is not on the Pacific Coast, but in the Eastern United States.

Manifestly, therefore, this district of the Pacific Coast is really and legitimately not entitled to command a share of this trade from the production standpoint, and as trade primarily belongs to the producers, it could almost entirely drift to the producing district east of the Mississippi River. The Orient is referred particularly to in this peculiar situation because Europe does, and will in the future, receive a goodly portion of foodstuffs from California and the Pacific Coast. But that business has been a heritage of many years' standing and is not to be considered in a general scheme of maintaining San Francisco and encouraging a constant healthy increase.

Manifestly if the Pacific Coast is not a producing section it is also not a consuming section, and of the vast importations which have been coming through this port, it has been carefully estimated that less than 20 per cent. has been actually consumed on the Pacific Coast. The remainder goes overland to Middle Western and Eastern districts. In other words, our problem is: How can we prevent the Oriental buyer from purchasing in Eastern centres and shipping by direct water lines from New York and other ports and through the canal? And how can we prevent the consumer on the Eastern seaboard from importing his goods over the same routes to his own seaports?

This, after all is said and done, is the real economic situation of this city. The best we can hope to do is to merely maintain ourselves for many years as nothing more or less than a channel through which merchandise is transported. To be able to do that will be something—and while that is being done our energies can be directed to the building up of industry so that in our children's time it is possible that we can actually control real business based on production and consumption.

During the last four years the trade of this port has represented itself by tremendously large figures in tonnage and money, and the traders have used those figures to innocently delude themselves into a belief that this business was permanently attracted on a sound economic basis. They forget that all that that business represented was a matter of convenience brought about by conditions interwoven with the eruptions caused by warfare. Certain lines from the Orient to the East Coast were disrupted. No transportation was possible between the Orient and Europe, and therefore San Francisco and the Pacific Coast became almost the entire point of concentration. As a result hundreds of importers and exporters, brokers, and organizations of every description depending upon that class of trade established themselves in this city and on this Coast and thrived beyond their fondest hopes. Today they are one by one folding up their tents and departing. Some few are taking their profits. A greater number are leaving them behind represented in overhead investment and mistaken business expansion.

The recent financial upheaval in Japan and the break in exchange in China, which has had a reaction throughout the entire Orient, coupled with an over-abundance of ship space and cargo-carrying capacity, has driven home in a brief ninety days something of this real situation to that part of this community. When this clear-up is finished we shall see remaining in this city probably 5 per cent. of the organizations that did business here in foreign trade a year ago, and it is a peculiar list of names that we look over. They are the same old reliable organizations that have done business in San Francisco for many years that we find still surviving.

In no sense of the word is this a business reaction as applied to this city. It is merely a settling down to a position that San Francisco has always occupied and will occupy in the future. At the same time there is no question but what foreign trade through this port has received a stimulant during four years of hectic activity and there will be a natural business greater than pre-war times as a matter of course. The particular points that it is desirable to drive home to our community are: First, that San Francisco must adopt some modern method of stimulating the flow of merchandise in and out of this port, even though it be for consumption in other districts. Second, that we must build our organizations and arrange our trade expenditures in the creation of manufacturing and increased overhead based on a careful analysis of exactly where this city and port stands in foreign trade considering its competitive relation to the Eastern seaboard. Do not be misled by flag-waving, enthusiastic newspaper and trade journal writers, and above all things, be careful to analyze statistics when you use them.

FIRE INSURANCE AS AN INVESTMENT.

San Francisco Is the Recognized Fire Insurance Centre for the Pacific Coast States.

By WILLIAM DEANS.

The value of the fire insurance business as an asset to the City of San Francisco is indicated by the following data: 160 companies maintain departmental offices, employing approximately 3000 persons, and handling premiums amounting to about $60,000,000 annually.

Therefore the subject of fire insurance is of interest to a large number of San Francisco citizens, directly and indirectly.

Conditions and experiences throughout the United States, insurancewise, are paralleled in the Pacific Coast States, and for which territory San Francisco is the recognized headquarters.

The campaign inaugurated by insurance companies and agents to induce the public to increase insurance because of higher replacement costs developed momentum which carried it well into the present year, and it is believed the premium income will exceed that of 1919, notwithstanding the heavy shrinkage in the value of our seasonal products, and which constitute a large percentage of the business in California.

The loss ratio will undoubtedly be higher than for several years, as there have been a number of heavy losses, several where property values in excess of half a million dollars each were destroyed.

Fresno, Hollister, Los Angeles, Sacramento, San Francisco, and Willows—the latter being a minor conflagration—all contributed too liberally to our state's ash heap.

Information available at this time indicates that the margin between profit and loss in the underwriting transactions of all companies will be very narrow, probably reaching the vanishing point with some of them.

Considering the active campaign for fire prevention conducted for several years under the direction of organizations supported by insurance companies, the number and magnitude of these fires are somewhat disconcerting, and it is difficult to ascribe a definite reason therefor, after several years of comparative immunity. However, an opinion prevails to the effect that it is not mere coincidence that they should occur when our entire business fabric is showing such a radical change in pattern. A breaking down in the morale, resulting in carelessness and indifference on the part of employer and employee as to condition of premises, cleanliness and housekeeping, a type of moral bazaar, is doubtless partly responsible for many of these fires.

Conditions in San Francisco have moved in sympathy with those prevailing throughout California. There has been a marked shrinkage in volume of premiums in the second half of the year, and the total will probably not exceed that for 1919.

There has been no improvement in the fire record, and the number of total losses to property may be attributed in large measure to the character of construction employed in mercantile and industrial plants, and indifference and ignorance of fire hazards.

The absence of adequate fire protection on the city's water-front owing to laying up of the two fireboats has been the cause of much concern to fire insurance companies. Notwithstanding the efforts of many commercial organizations it has not been possible to have this serious condition remedied, there being a difference of opinion between the city and state officials as to which should bear the expense, but originally it was a labor problem, which the city officials declined to solve. There is no evidence of an early settlement of the question, and meanwhile there exists the possibility of a water-front conflagration, which in addition to heavy financial loss would paralyze the shipping business of the port at a time when other cities on the Pacific Coast are striving to build up their shipping trade.

The development and growth of aviation has opened up a new field of activities to insurance companies, providing protection against loss from the various hazards incident to the use of aeroplanes. A comparatively small number of companies have manifested interest or curiosity enough to engage actively in this class of insurance, and after a brief and costly experience they have withdrawn until a greater measure of reliability and safety is attained in the mechanism and operation of aeroplanes as a commercial venture. The bad record thus far is attributed to recklessness on the part of aviators and poor quality of gasoline used. In the meantime there is likely to be little competition for such business.

The practice of writing all classes of insurance, other than life, by combinations of companies under the same management is a present-day tendency. As the rules and rates applicable to these various lines are made by different underwriting associations or boards, uniformity in practice and cooperation are not possible unless all the companies are members of all the associations.

To the officials of some companies which prefer to confine their operations to fire insurance and closely allied lines this tendency is somewhat disturbing, as it handicaps them in agencies and seems to possess possibilities for demoralization in the business.

Automobile insurance is now being written by practically all fire companies. Like the automobile industry, this class of insurance has developed so rapidly, rating systems and underwriting practices have not yet been standardized, each year producing new models, just as with motor-cars.

The marine and casualty companies also write automobile coverages, and methods and ethics differ radically from those maintaining in fire insurance; therefore fire underwriters have not been attracted to the business, but have been gradually drawn into it because of an apparent advantage it gives those companies writing the class over non-writing companies, rather than the profit it yields. Premiums on automobile insurance in California has shown a large increase each year, but competition is keen, inter-insurers, mutual companies, and automobile associations writing about as much as the stock companies.

As a result of the depression in the automobile industry at present, conditions in the insurance branch are likewise unsettled and the year will show little, if any, profit, and no satisfaction in the handling of the business.

The elaborate advertising campaigns being carried on is suggestive of the rivalry existing between the leading companies, or those aspiring to leadership, at least in volume of business transacted. The matter is interesting and instructive, and runs the gamut from the "arts and sciences to homely philosophy," the tenor of some of the articles suggesting the possession of certain virtues in larger measure than their competitors.

Singularly enough, comparatively little of this highly literary publicity comes under the observation of the insuring public, as it appears almost exclusively in insurance journals which circulate among company officials and agents. This may indicate a belief on the part of company officials that the business originates with the agent, and is an endorsement of the American agency system.

The American propensity to regulate business by legislation—too frequently destructive rather than constructive—is excised freely on insurance of all kinds.

The California legislature at its last session passed a law prohibiting certain institutions from engaging in the business of fire insurance, but that refuge of the liberty loving—not to mention "reformers"—the referendum was invoked by the interests adversely affected by the measure.

The question at issue was a difficult one to place before the voters in an easily understandable manner, and by their votes the people decided that hanks should not be eliminated from the business of fire insurance.

When it is realized that there is a point of contact between fire insurance and every other class of business it will be readily apparent why underwriters are vitally interested in the conditions prevailing in every trade and industry, and fire insurance may be relied upon to assume its share of responsibility incident to the reconstruction of the nation's business.

Because of its affinity for all other classes of business, individually and collectively, fire insurance naturally finds itself confronted with problems similar to those engaging the attention of the commercial and industrial interests of the country at this time.

The era of war-inspired prosperity, extending over a period of five years, reached its apex about midyear, and the truth of the axiom, "Whatever goes up is sure to come down," is being demonstrated in a very uncomfortable and convincing manner.

In all human activities the "going up" process is rarely fraught with danger—it is coming down and alighting wherein lurk the possibilities of disaster.

With a vast accumulation of liability acquired on the basis of high values incident to war-time conditions underwriters are being called upon to provide "shock absorbers" to meet the avalanche in commodity prices now in motion, and their skill and capacity will be tested to the utmost, but in the light of past experiences there is no doubt but they will prove equal to the task.

Fire insurance is practically the only large business which can not be charged with profiteering, there having been an advance of but 10 per cent. in rates, in the nature of a war tax, effective for one year only; therefore the ratio of loss and expense remains on the same basis as that which prevailed prior to the war. premiums incident to higher values for insurable property of every character made it possible for companies to operate without advancing rates, but their trade profit on a large percentage of this business has yet to be determined.

As the basis of values for insurance purposes, in a final analysis, is the cost of replacement, it is readily apparent that with the cataracting in prices and cost of commodities of every kind now in process a condition is likely to develop where friction between a "hundred thousand dollar" insurance policy and an "eighty thousand dollar" inventory is likely to result in active combustion. This is what is termed the "moral" hazard, and is the only hazard for which no charge is provided in rating schedules.

It seems rather a serious reflection on our standard of business integrity that the moral hazard in fire insurance is looked upon so lightly. However, as the dollar is a symbol of selfishness, and is jealous of its rights, it is perhaps not remarkable that business men and institutions of unquestioned honesty otherwise are quite willing to accept insurance money made available through the criminal acts of others whose guilt it may or may not be possible to prove.

This is the particular phase of the situation which is the greatest cause for concern on the part of underwriters at this time, as during the period of inflation in credits most business organizations assumed obligations which are now maturing, and in the face of a falling market there is a temptation to be careless in many ways which stop short of the criminal stage.

A New Horror.

A new horror, the product of efficiency, speed, and perhaps civilization, is the machine which takes one's photograph automatically after a coin is deposited in the proper slot. This instrument of torture—for even painless photography becomes torture after the portrait is completed and set forth to view—is no simple affair. The voluntary victim sits down before the machine and drops his coin in the slot as requested. Immediately follows much business of preparation for the ordeal. A bell rings, then a small card appears urging the sitter to "Be careful. Turn your head to the right, fix your eyes on the little cross above the mirror—and smile." It may sound easy, but imagine smiling at the behest of a printed placard without the aid of the genial photographer's little bird! There is another bell and another card which tells one to sit perfectly still. And then, before one knows it,

 Our Combined Dwelling and Rental Policy*

Building under present day shortages of labor and material requires more time than ever before. Rents have never been higher. As a result of these conditions "Rental Values" of dwellings have become a matter of importance, and should be protected by insurance. Every day that a dwelling remains vacant for repairs means a loss to the owner—whether he occupies the dwelling himself or whether he rents it to tenants.

If you derive your income from tenants you are taking the serious and unnecessary risk of losing that income—without rent insurance.

If you occupy your own home you are overlooking an opportunity to provide against a possible heavy expense—if you go without rent insurance.

A fire may cause just as great a financial loss through the "Loss of Use" of your property as through the actual physical damage to your property.

CALIFORNIA'S OIL INDUSTRY.

The Year Eventful, But Despite Variety of Difficulties Developments Are Encouraging.

By D. M. FOLSOM.

A review of operations in the California oil fields for any single year does not under ordinary conditions present a fair picture of the industry, nor does it afford a basis for estimating the future trend of the industry.

However, the year 1920 is notable in that the shortage of petroleum products, which was always impending and sometimes actual, afforded a demonstration of the dependence of Pacific Coast transportation and industries upon the products of California petroleum. This situation led to a rapid rise in prices during the first half of the year, and encouraged increased development which was successful in bringing production equal to consumption during the last quarter of the year.

Taking up the various branches of the industry, and beginning with production, the areas of proven oil lands in California, according to the state mining bureau's figures as of March 1, 1920, are as follows:

County—	Acres
Fresno	13,924
Kern	58,371
Los Angeles	2,931
Orange	3,879
Ventura	2,172
Santa Barbara	9,663
San Luis Obispo	772
Santa Clara	80
Total	91,792

The productive area in the state has been increased by development at the east end of the Elk Hills in San Joaquin County, where wells having an initial yield averaging over 3000 barrels per day have been secured on land belonging to the Standard Oil and Southern Pacific companies, and also by the discovery by the Standard Oil Company of oil at Huntington Beach, in Orange County, Southern California.

However, a great part of the drilling during the year has been unproductive, and many areas which have previously been considered as possible sources of oil have been tested and condemned by drilling. With the exception of the Elk Hills, the discovery of a deeper sand in the Richfield District in Orange County, and the Huntington Beach discovery, all of the tests in wildcat areas in California which have been carried to completion during the year have been failures.

Drilling in many of the older districts where extension of the present proven territory was expected has been disappointing, and the fields have been definitely outlined by dry holes.

Development work has been successful in increasing production, but was somewhat discouraging in view of the fact that more wells were drilled during the past year than in any previous year, and a great part of these wells were so-called wildcats drilled in search of new productive territory:

Lost Hills-Belridge	23
Coalinga	47
Lompoc and Santa Maria	25
Ventura County and Newhall	18
Whittier-Fullerton (inc. Richfield)	96
Total	420

Production figures, as announced by the Standard Oil Company and by the Independent Oil Producers' Agency, indicate that the 1920 output of California crude oil will equal the previous high mark of 1914 (104,000,000 barrels), while the value of the production is much greater than in any previous year. Distributed by fields, the production this year in comparison with 1919 is estimated as follows:

Field—	1919 Production	1920 Estimated Production (42-gallon barrels)
Kern River	7,563,025	7,500,000
McKittrick	2,810,848	2,640,000

Summerland	53,680	53,000
Watsonville	27,375	27,000
Totals	101,221,784	104,200,000

The most noteworthy facts shown by this table are the increase in the Midway-Sunset district due to the production in Elk Hills and the sustained production in the Whittier-Fullerton district, which has held its own due to the heavy drilling campaign in the Monte-hello and Richfield districts. The state mining bureau has recently published interesting statistics showing the oil production of the various fields of the state and the percentage of water produced with the oil for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The price obtained for crude oil in California at different times during 1920 is shown in the following table in comparison with the average 1919 price:

PUBLISHED PRICES OF STANDARD OIL COMPANY. (Per 42-gal. bbl. crude oil in the field.)

In addition, producing companies of crude oil whose output has not been tied up under contract, have been able to secure premiums over the above quoted Standard Oil published prices, ranging from 15 cents to 25 cents per barrel for heavy oil below 18° gravity to 50 cents to 75 cents for oil of refinable grade.

Taking up the refining and distribution of California oil: a greater percentage, and consequently a greater amount of California output, was refined in 1920 than in any preceding year; and, furthermore, the percentage of refined products obtained from the oil was greatly increased in order to partially meet the demand for gasoline and other distilled products. The United States Bureau of Mines publishes monthly statistics on the output of refineries in the United States, which show the following figures for California for the first eight months of 1920:

Total crude run.....	42-gal. bbls. 18,960,876
Output of gasoline.....	7,557,420
Output of kerosene.....	3,190,575

In addition to our own manufacture of gasoline California companies bought in the Mid-Continent fields for Pacific Coast consumption approximately 1,500,000 barrels of gasoline. During the summer months of May, June and July the shortage of gasoline was so acute that rationing systems were put into effect by the larger retailing companies. This shortage of gasoline was brought about by increased demand, not only for automobiles, but also for tractors, gasoline pumping engines, and other farm use.

In order to provide increased output of gasoline for the future the large refining companies are installing new stills which either will cut lower into the crude or will produce a "cracked" gasoline by retreating the heavier distillates under high temperature and pressure to break down the heavier constituents of the oil into compounds of lighter gravity and lower boiling point. This, of course, will reduce the available amount of fuel oil produced from California crude.

The total consumption of California oil during 1920 will exceed production by approximately 6,000,000 barrels. The overrun of consumption over production was so threatening during the first half of 1920 that the marketing companies refused to enter into any new contracts for the delivery of fuel oil, and industries depending upon this form of fuel have been obliged to secure deliveries, without contract or assurance of permanent supply, on the current market basis. This shortage of fuel oil was due largely to increased demand by the navy and shipping hoard vessels operating on the Pacific Coast and also to the requirements of the power companies, who were forced on account of the dry season to carry a large part of their load by means of their auxilliary steam plants:

APPROXIMATE UTILIZATION OF CAL. CRUDE, 1920.
Consumed by the industry itself.....	8,000,000 Barrels
Consumed in gasoline, distillates, lubricants	17,000,000
Railroads	34,000,000
Shipping, including navy.....	16,000,000

1920 estimated production.....	110,000,000
	104,000,000

Consumption over production.....6,000,000

Some of the marketing companies have attempted to restrict consumption by cutting off customers in districts where other fuel or power is available, particularly in districts outside of California.

A study of the fuel oil situation, completed in October, by the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce indicated that over 70 per cent. of the fuel oil consumption was within California or on vessels hunkering at California ports. The rest of the consumption is distributed between Hawaii, Canada, Washington, and Oregon, with only small shipments to Arizona, Nevada, Alaska, and Mexico.

In general the consumption outside of California comes under railroads, shipping, or public utility use, and it will be a very difficult matter to effect a geographical curtailment.

As far as can be judged from the present situation, both demand and production can be expected to increase during 1921, and the oil companies can hope to meet demand only by continued activity in search for new fields.

"THE DEPARTMENT STORE OF FINANCE."

The Trust Company Cares for Every Financial or Fiduciary Need of Its Customers.

By R. D. BRIGHAM.

Years ago many people scoffed at the idea of a store wherein they could purchase articles or goods of every description. They thought that no one man, or organization of men, could master all the details of buying and selling widely varied lines of merchandise. They thought that if they wanted to buy ready-made clothes they should go to a clothing store; if they wanted dry goods, the dry goods store was the place to go. Then along came Marshall Field in Chicago with the announcement that he would give $1000 to any charitable organization if any person could come into his store and ask for an article that he could not supply. Immediately people by the thousands flocked to the Marshall Field store and they found a veritable city where merchandise of all uses and descriptions was attractively displayed and sold. No one won the $1000 because Marshall Field had anticipated the every need of all the people. Thus the department store of today was born.

For years banks were just banks, "a place where money was deposited." Some gave this service, some that. None gave too much service, many too little. In order to transact different kinds of banking it was necessary for people to go to different kinds of banks. The need for financial institutions equipped to render all banking services arose and the modern Trust Company was inaugurated. Through the centuries, wherever there has been a need for any particular service or benefit to mankind, that need has been furnished, and thus civilization progresses. It will always be so.

The business of the modern Trust Company of today is based on "faith, hope, and credit," and as proof of their value to communities trust companies are growing rapidly in all parts of the United States. The modern Trust Company could repeat Marshall Field's offer, because every banking need, or service, can be supplied within its walls. When you run the gamut of Trust Company services, you cover all banking services known to mankind. The modern Trust Company has these major departments—Trust Department; Commercial Department; Savings Department; Bond or Securities Department; Safe Deposit Department; Foreign Exchange Department, and Real Estate Department, as well as many minor departments.

From his birth to his death, man's financial and fiduciary affairs can be handled to the best possible advantage by a Trust Company. When the child is born, the proud mother or father opens a savings account for the little tot in a Trust Company. This savings account helps to pay for the education of the boy through high school and college. The boy grows to manhood and marries, the Trust Company helps him to purchase a home. Later he may enter business for himself and the Trust Company, through its Commercial and Foreign Exchange Departments, extends the proper credit to him so that he can buy goods advantageously. He saves a certain part of his earnings and the Bond or Securities Department helps him to select the properly diversified investments. All through his business life he makes good use of the Safe Deposit Department of the Trust Company.

Middle age vanishes into old age and then the most important work of the Trust Company begins. He appoints the Trust Company executor of his estate. He wants to leave a lasting monument to his memory. His property, or his business, is a signal to the world of his ability—a monument of his success: broadly speaking, it is the chief evidence of what he has done. He does not want his good work and accomplishments to die with him. He wants to leave his worldly possessions in the hands of trained experts who will not dissipate his affairs, either knowingly or unintentionally. With the Trust Company as his agent, his estate lives on after his death, a moving, vital being. The Trust Company without fear or prejudice, but actuated only by sound business judgment, passes his estate on to the second generation intact, wisely managed and sympathetically administered, according to the exact terms of the will.

The man who makes a will with the skillful aid of his attorney and appoints a Trust Company as executor does the only thing possible to insure the administration of his estate in strict accordance with his wishes. Individuals often make good executors, but they may move, die, or prove otherwise unsatisfactory. The Trust Company lives on forever and until the last dollar of the estate is administered the Trust Company serves faithfully, conscientiously, and honorably to the last.

The Trust Company may be called "the department store of finance," but in addition it is "the mother of finance," because it cares for every financial or fiduciary need of its customers from the cradle to the grave.

THE BOND MARKET.

By R. H. Shurtliff.

If one were to examine a curve depicting the price of bonds since November, 1918, it would present much the appearance of a seismograph during a violent earthquake. Immediately following the close of the war, after confidence became renewed in the minds of the investors, bonds took a sharp turn upward. As the era of rising commodity prices, which encouraged multitudinous new financing, started at the same time, however, borrowers soon began paying more and more for money and bond prices jogged downward. Since July, 1919, the lot of the bond-buyer has not been a particularly happy one, unless he was wise enough to purchase very short-term securities. As near as can be told, however, from the present close perspective, the climax of this downward sweep in bond prices was reached in September, 1920. The curve since that time has been upward. There is now a definite opinion amongst the majority of bond buyers that prices will continue to strengthen and, as a result, there is a great preference for long-term securities which will give the investor the advantage of present interest rates for a long period of time.

To decide on the correctness of this assumption one must study the causes of changing bond prices. The governing influence is of course the rate of money. If interest rates are high bond prices are downward because the lower the price of a bond the higher the interest rate it pays on this price. Because of this relationship the decline in the last year can be definitely traced to rise of interest rates. Since this is true, and since the price of money varies with the law of supply and demand, the problem of future bond prices may be stated merely as to whether the supply of credit will catch up to the demand for the same in the period just ahead of us. In most peoples' minds it will, and the chief reason is that we are unquestionably entering a period of industrial cessation. A letting-up of industry means a lessening credit demand to continue industry. When borrowers cease to be able to make money on capital borrowed at 8 per cent. and more, the demand for money will lessen and interest rates will go down.

There is all over the land an evidence of slowing up in business. There is at the same time, and has been for a some months, a determined pressure toward liquidation. The slowing up in business will lessen the demand for capital and the liquidation of commodities will increase the supply of capital.

There is only one element in the whole situation that may contribute to offset this tendency, and that is foreign government and foreign municipal borrowing. Their exigencies are often so pressing and the field in which they can borrow is so limited that so long as they can gain credit in this country they are apt to do so regardless of interest rates. It is hardly probable, however, that American investors will absorb enough of this class of bonds to affect the general situation.

The chief classes of borrowers which will probably be in demand of funds within the next few months are the utilities and the railroads. At the same time these are the classes which will benefit most by falling prices, and whose future outlook therefore seems the brightest. The experienced investor will probably then invest in long-term bonds because he thinks interest rates are falling, and he will select bonds amongst the public utility and railroad offerings because he thinks these the safest investments.

MEMORIAL TO STATE'S DEAD SOLDIERS.

Replica of Palais De La Legion D'Honneur, Paris, France.

"Halt! Who goes there?" St. Peter cries, As thru the dusk a maimed figure comes: "Tis I, a Legionnaire!" the voice replies—"Then," "Enter, Comrade; sound loud the drums."

Any Frenchman who arrives in San Francisco after next year will wonder, as he visits Lincoln Park, whether he is really in his beloved Paris or whether one of the most beautiful (and surely one of the most interesting) of the public buildings of that wonderful city has been removed bodily to the Golden Gate. And truly may he wonder; for at Lincoln Park, and corresponding in every particular to the original Palais de la Legion d'Honneur, will stand a California Palace of the Legion of Honor, a Memorial to the memory of those California sons who fell on the sacred soil of France in the Great War.

There are War Memorials and War Memorials, but where else than in San Francisco could there be such a sentimentally inspired and beautifully conceived project. To link the glorious past with the glorious present and future—around the idea of the world-famed Legion d'Honneur, but brought down to date by the sacrifice of those men who form California's new and immortal Legion of Honor. A noble thought. And a worthy one.

Think back some decades, and dwell for a moment on the origin and composition of France's great military order. Founded by Napoleon, the Legion was composed of the most valiant knights of that turbulent era. No easy task gained admission to the order. Ah, no! It required an act of supreme valor, some outstanding service to the empire, to gain admission to the splendid ranks and wear the coveted decoration. Later, civilians who performed great deeds which would cause France especially to honor the doers entered their names on the roll, but mostly the Legion is known for the names of the warrior heroes who did great deeds, and often died, for France.

How fitting it is, then, that the Palace soon to be erected here in San Francisco should be in honor of California's military heroes. And how proudly solemn is the thought that every hero, without regard to rank or title, will have his memory kept green in this superb Memorial.

Superb it is, too. A replica of the French Palais, the present one there being built after the design of the burned one which Rousseau built, San Francisco's War Memorial will remind visitors to the 1915 Exposition of the architecturally famous French Building there. That building was a copy of the Palais de la Legion d'Honneur in Paris. The War Memorial will be, also. Looking at the photograph on this page, one has a faint idea of the splendid proportions and the inherent beauty of the structure.

When finished, with its tablets giving the names of the hero dead, and housing the wonderful collection of paintings and sculptural masterpieces which have been presented or promised, all California—yes, all the United States—will have just cause for pride in the Memorial itself, and just reason for complimenting Mr. and Mrs. Adolph B. Spreckels for their generosity as donors and for their tact and sentiment in choosing the form of the gift.

But let Mrs. Spreckels tell in her own words the thought behind the gift, and something about the treasures to be housed therein. When Mrs. Spreckels was recently interviewed she hurriedly passed over her work in connection with the Memorial, but grew enthusiastic about the action of the French government and others who will provide many of the valuable exhibits which will remain in the Memorial always. She said:

"Oh, it isn't so important who gave the Memorial. What is important is the fact that our California heroes should certainly have a Memorial, and the fact that everybody is so enthusiastically helpful about the kind of one we had in mind. From the highest officers of the French government we received the very best offers of cooperation, and from every one, both in the United States and abroad, the most helpful suggestions and offers of exhibits came just as soon as Mr. Spreckels and myself announced our desire to do honor to this state's immortal dead.

"When the Duchess of Vendome, quite the 'first lady of the land' in the opinion of the French, voluntarily promised to form a circle of fifty of her immediate friends and become responsible for the decorating and furnishing (with wonderful and rare objets d'art, you can well believe) of one complete room in the Memorial.

"And Queen Mary of Roumania is going to provide a Roumanian room. You can be quite sure that Her Majesty will, for this purpose, part with some treasured and valuable things.

"And you probably know already that His Excellency Monsieur Honorat, the French Minister of Public Instruction and Fine Arts, and Paul Leon, Director of Fine Arts, have given, in the name of the republic, four magnificent and immensely valuable Gobelin tapestries depicting four episodes in the life of the new Saint, but well-beloved martyr known to all the world, Jeanne d'Arc, the 'Maid of France.' And also France has given a remarkable collection of the coins of the republic and her colonies, and some priceless and very beautiful pieces of Sevres ware, that lovely and delicate china which the world justly admires and for specimens of which tremendous prices are paid.

"I perhaps should not in the same breath say much about the Rodin masterpieces which of the conflict, she should seek to bring France and America closer together, because she is a direct descendant of a Marshal of France, the Marquis le Normand de Bretteville, an emigre during the French Revolution, and who became, after Napoleon's fall, the head of the nation's armies. His grandson, the Marquis de Bretteville, Colonel of the Grenadier Guards under Napoleon III and grand officer of the Legion of Honor, was Mrs. Spreckels' granduncle. Mrs. Spreckels, as every one knows, accomplished much notable war relief work in that part of Belgium which the Germans did not occupy. And it was mainly Mrs. Spreckels who was responsible for the American Red Cross deciding to send relief into Roumania, as she investigated the horrible conditions obtaining there and sent a direct representative back to the United States to acquaint officials of the Red Cross with the real facts in the case. These two achievements naturally explain the fervor with which Belgium and Roumania entered into cooperation with Mrs. Spreckels the moment she announced the gift which she and her husband were going to make to San Francisco.

There flourishes virtue, honor, and beauty, Desire for praise and fear of infamy.

So Ronsard said of all France, but he could just as well have spoken the words with direct relation to the Legion d'Honneur itself and GIFT HEARTILY COMMENDED.

Newspapers Laud Givere, Praise Idea, and Envy San Francisco.

The New York Evening Telegram says: "Why has New York no Mrs. A. B. Spreckels? The lady lives in San Francisco and has presented that city with a wonderful Memorial Palace, to cost over $1,000,000, in memory of the California boys who died in the great war.

"The monumental edifice will be a replica of the Palace of the Legion of Honor in Paris and will be erected on an imposing site overlooking the harbor of San Francisco. Various rooms in this grand Memorial will be decorated by the French government, Mrs. Spreckels, the Duchess of Vendome, the Queen of Roumania. There will be exhibited priceless relics of ancient lands, and in addition the Memorial will house the famous sculptural works of Rodin, the master, which works, owned by Mrs. Spreckels, include the well-known 'Le Penseur' ('The Thinker')."

The American Legion Weekly, under a three-column headline, and with a splendid picture of Mrs. A. B. Spreckels, says:

"Mrs. Alma de Brettville Spreckels, wife of A. B. Spreckels of San Francisco, is donating to the people of California a magnificent war memorial building costing $1,000,000, which will be a replica of the home of the Legion of Honor in Paris. The memorial building will be at Inspiration Point, Lincoln Park, San Francisco. Mrs. Spreckels is of a famous French family, being a descendant of Gilbert de Brettville, one of the followers of William the Conqueror.

"As the Statue of Liberty, gift of the French people to the United States, greets those who come to our shores from the Old World, so will a structure conceived in France greet those who come from the Far East through San Francisco, for the site of the Memorial looks down on the Golden Gate and the broad Pacific.

"When Mrs. Spreckels conceived the idea of a California war memorial her thoughts at once turned to the Legion of Honor building in Paris as typifying something of real meaning to Americans and at the same time carrying out her idea of beauty appropriate to a memorial structure. "I wanted," she said, "something that would signify individual sacrifice and devotion in the cause of patriotism, and the Legion of Honor building, and the idea behind it, seemed best to express what was wanted."

"It has long been the ambition of Mrs. Spreckels to get together in one collection all the masterpieces of Auguste Rodin, the world-famous sculptor, and that ambition will now be realized, as all the masterpieces of Rodin which Mrs. Spreckels owns will be housed in the magnificent War Memorial building she is to erect."

The New York American, in an interview with Mrs. Spreckels just as she returned from Paris bearing the promise of hearty cooperation from the French government in the matter of decorations and famous relics for the War Memorial, said:

"Not only the French government, but also many other agencies abroad, will cooperate in the success of Mrs. A. B. Spreckels' wonderful War Memorial, which is to be erected by her husband and herself in honor of the Californians who fell in the world war.

"The City of San Francisco has already donated a site in Lincoln Park, so that the palace, facing the bay, will command a magnificent sweep of the Golden Gate.

"Permission has been granted by the French government for a duplication to be made of the famous Palais of the Legion d'Honneur, and Mrs. Spreckels has the official promise of many noteworthy gifts to be exhibited therein.

"Perhaps the most noteworthy of these gifts is a set of four wonderful tapestries, by Gobelin, depicting the life of Joan of Arc, woven at the government works after cartoons painted by the eminent French artist, Jean Paul Laurens."

It has been figured up that there are about 12,000 small towns in the United States, half of them with populations of 500 or less. It is these small towns that the rural people are intimately associated with. They sell their produce there, buy the things they need; in fact, these are a part of the rural community. Some of these small towns will become cities, but a very large per cent. of them will remain as they are almost indefinitely.

SAN FRANCISCO'S WAR MEMORIAL, THE GIFT OF MR. AND MRS. A. B. SPRECKELS.

my husband and I are going to place in the Memorial. But you will, I hope, pardon me for being enthusiastic about their being placed in this open-to-the-public-of-the-world Memorial, where the home folks and the traveler alike can come and enjoy their beauty and learn their message.

"If the architect thinks well of the suggestion, I hope to place Rodin's 'Le Penseur' ('The Thinker') at some little distance in front of the Memorial, so that visitors will, upon seeing this statue and feeling its real meaning, enter the Memorial in the true spirit of the place.

"You see, that bronze to me typifies the way in which my country, America, entered the war—with deliberation, after meditation, knowing the cause was right. The other works of Rodin, such as 'The Age of Brass,' 'St. John the Baptist,' 'Eve,' 'The Siren,' 'Head of Balzac,' 'The Prodigal Son,' and others, will be placed where they can be seen to best advantage.

"Justice, Victory, Honor. These three are the trinity of qualities which Mr. Spreckels and I desired to remind people of, in connection with the sacrifices made by the sons of California, whenever visitors came to see the Memorial.

"But do not let me speak too much about our part in the matter. What counts so much is the valor and sacrifice which prompted the idea of the Memorial, and the overwhelming and generous response from both America and France in the matter of compliments, congratulations, and gifts. Truly the idea of 'Hands Across the Sea' could not better be typified than by the thought of both nations rallying to the support of San Francisco's Memorial."

Mrs. Spreckels' modesty must be respected, but it may well be believed that all California, and especially the citizens of San Francisco, must indeed be proud that living in our midst is a family whose patriotism is so great, whose civic pride is so high, and whose feeling about the sacrifices of California's sons is so sincere, that without thought of the expense involved, and without thought of the pain of parting with rare and historic art treasures, such a wonderful, appropriate, and altogether lovely Memorial could be conceived and brought into being for the whole world to see and to admire—in memory of the part played in the Great War by men from this state.

It is perhaps only natural that Mrs. Spreckels' interest should have turned during the war to France, and that, as an aftermath to the souls of its members whose memorials hang in the Palais of the Order on the left side of the Seine, opposite the Jardin des Tuileries. For it must be remembered that no unworthy person is ever admitted into the Legion—and no unworthy person is a member of that great American legion whose immortality is emphasized and acknowledged by the Memorial soon to be built. Ronsard's words fittingly apply to these—as they became blood brothers of the French Legion when they spilled their precious blood for France.

The soul of either order, French or American, is the soul of those who, by their sufferings and their death, entered into the heroic ranks of the greatest knighthood; it is the soul of the soldiers of the First Republic; or the soldiers of Pershing's army; the soul of soldiers who were "gentlemen unafraid."

So, as France keeps alive the spirit that prompts the deeds which result in membership in the order, San Francisco will keep alive the spirit of our American Legion of Honor—that the whole world, on pilgrimage to this shrine of devotion, may not forget the sublime sacrifices made by California's heroic dead.

Mr. A. Applegarth, the well-known San Francisco architect, went on a tour of all the principal American museums in order to gather all the best ideas relative to the lighting and heating of the rooms in the Memorial. The interior arrangement of the Memorial will differ slightly from the arrangement in the original Palais in Paris, in order that the wealth of exhibits may be housed appropriately.

Monsieur Henri Guillaume, the architect who supervised the erection of the French Building at the Exposition (which you will remember is also a replica of the Palais of the Legion d'Honneur in Paris), has kindly agreed to assist in the erecting of the Memorial, and will give abundantly of his knowledge of not only architecture, but also of all the details of the original Palais.

Specially interesting landscape work will be done in order that the Memorial Palace will have the best setting and approach. Inspiration Point, Lincoln Park, is, as you will remember, the site for Mrs. Spreckels' wonderful gift; with its exceptionally beautiful outlook it will indeed be one of San Francisco's show places when the Memorial and its surrounding greenery and flowers are ready to view. No visitor to the Bay region will be allowed to miss seeing San Francisco's Memorial.

OUR COURSE SINCE THE ARMISTICE.

A Comparison of Civil War and World War Conditions.

By H. B. AINSWORTH.

In this period of reconstruction we have little precedent on which to base estimates of the future. Conditions are influenced by world affairs and national legislation to a degree that would not obtain were the price levels normal and business following its usual uninterrupted course. After the civil war we experienced an immediate drop in labor and material values, and for many years a continuously declining market; but since the armistice there have been violent fluctuations in commodity prices, and our highest general averages were not reached until the spring of 1920.

The civil war could hardly be taken as a precedent, because we were physically and financially exhausted when it ended, our currency depreciated, and the rest of the world our creditor. Today our wealth is greater than ever before, our financial system better guarded, our country and its man-power never more fit, opportunities—domestic and foreign—knocking at our door. So we haven't wounds to heal or a debt so burdensome that our commercial progress need suffer any real check.

CAUSES OF INFLATION.

War requirements—with the inevitable huge demand upon our country's resources—resulted in abnormal prices for labor and material, and created a necessity for the vast expansion we have witnessed in our currency.

In the monthly bulletins of the Federal Reserve Board there are tables showing the condition in total of the portfolios of about 800 member banks in selected cities which are said to typify the general situation. The tables show that government-secured loans during 1920 were reduced from $1,289,000,000 to $911,000,000, while other loans and investments increased from $15,385,000,000 to $16,041,000,000. The table follows:

1920.	Government		Total Loans and All Other Investments
	Secured	Unsecured
January 2	1,289	15,385	16,674
February 6	1,191	15,436	16,627
March 5	1,184	15,656	16,840

October 1	949	16,196	17,145
November 5	911	16,041	16,952

The following figures from the board's published statements show how steadily legitimate use of credit has been granted for agricultural, commercial, and industrial purposes—while war paper was being withdrawn into the safe-deposit boxes of investors:

It will be seen from the above figures (supplied by Federal Reserve Bank) that this burden has been increasing since the war, with the increase in commodity prices and in volume of foreign and domestic trade. Seasonal requirements for harvesting and marketing crops have taken up any slack that might have resulted from marked declines in values since April, 1920.

DEFLATION IN PROSPECT.

There is evidence that the pendulum has begun to swing the other way. Our crops have been harvested, and money should be easier when they are marketed. The railroad freight situation is greatly improved, releasing vast sums that were tied up earlier in the year through serious delays in freight transportation; and reduction in commodity values, to be inevitably followed by lower wages (which may be expected to decline in proportion as the purchasing power of the dollar increases), will reduce the capital needs of all enterprises and lead to continuous deflation. The following figures (supplied by the Liberty National Bank of New York) are interesting, as showing extent of decline in important commodities from high-water mark; further marked declines have taken place since this publication—notably in wheat, to $1.50 per bushel; hides to 14c; sugar, to 8½c; copper, to 13¾c:

Copper—Electrolytic, declined from a high peak of 35.74 cents per pound to 15.25 cents.

Cotton—Middling, from 43.75 cents per pound to 22.75 cents.

Hides and Skins—Native steers heavy, from 53.5 cents per pound to 24.5 cents; calf skins, from $1 to 17.5 cents.

Iron—Bessemer pig-iron, from $37.45 per ton to $46.98.

Rubber—Plantation first latex crepe, from 90 cents per pound to 24 cents.

Silk—Japan No. 1 Shinshiu, from $17.40 per pound to $6.30.

Sugar—Raw centrifugal 96 degrees, from 23.57 cents per pound to 8.53 cents.

Wheat—No. 2 red winter, from $3.15 per bushel to $2.15.

Wool—Ohio one-fourth blood, from 80 cents per pound to 37½ cents; territory fine staple, from $2.10 to $1.07½.

The trend in most lines is still downward, though some commodities appear to have reached low-water mark, and may even react to slightly higher levels, because they have been temporarily forced, through emergencies, to points below replacement cost.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE.

Recognition should be given in this period of stress to the Federal Reserve Bank. The Federal Reserve Act was a piece of truly constructive legislation that has been far-reaching in the protection afforded to all classes in all avenues of trade and commerce. It was the creation of master minds in the world of finance, and has been put to a crucial test during the past four years. But the automatic working of this superb financial machine has given proof of the sound principles which underlie its structure, and there is ample evidence that the vast service it can render in aiding deflation will be wisely and certainly applied. Its influence has gone far to discourage and halt a wild era of extravagance in the United States, which assumed such proportions in 1919 as to undermine safe principles in business.

POST-WAR EXTRAVAGANCE.

Thousands of newly-made millionaires emerged from our war activities, and the usual result of extravagance attending easy money was evidenced everywhere. Manufacturers and wholesalers in every line were willing to pay unheard-of prices for all the material they could get; and labor—because of the demand for it—charged more and gave less efficiency than ever before. These increased costs were reflected in the price to consumers, and the retail merchants—because of difficulties in getting deliveries and tempted by the heavy demand for their wares at any price they saw fit to ask—often doubled their normal orders in the hope of getting at least a 50 per cent. delivery. The farmer was receiving war prices for all he could produce, and returns from the soil were attracting investors in farm lands, that sold, especially throughout the Middle West, at prices ranging from three to five times their normal values. Enthusiasm increased with profits, and production rapidly increased beyond our capacity to absorb. There was evident danger in the situation, which merchants and manufacturers, up to the spring of 1920, seemed inclined to ignore while profits were large and the price tendency upward.

A TURN IN THE ROAD.

Many enterprises, because of increased costs, were short of capital to finance their operations; and when it became evident to the purchasing public that prices were due to decline, the demand ceased. Retailers sought cover by reducing their stocks and canceling orders. In a measure they have bettered their condition during the past eight months by ordering only from hand to mouth and working down their stocks; but prices are still tending abruptly downward, while the purchasing public waits. From a demand at maximum prices for everything from the soil to the consumer, we are now confronted with a sudden general over-supply, necessitating a marked slowing down of all industries, reductions in pay-rolls, and many idle men. Wholesalers, in general, have met the situation by charging off huge losses due to shrinkage in inventory values. Many large manufacturers are marking time, or operating on greatly reduced schedules. Farmers, who bought land at values based on war returns, must also pay the price of their folly.

BENEFITS AND COST OF DEFLATION.

Those who have enjoyed prosperous years and kept their heads will be able to get by with a fair average profit over the whole period of rise and fall in commodity values. Through this period of deflation provident, intelligent operators in every line will pass with different degrees of loss, but all such will emerge better for the experience, on a safer business basis, with their losses behind them, credit established, and a market that, from all visible signs, will be broader and more stable in character than any enjoyed in recent years.

It is not the purpose of this article to minimize the huge losses that are inevitable. In this connection Bradstreet estimates a decline up to November 1st of 34½ per cent. in commodity prices from the year's high level. November brought the largest number of business failures since January, 1908, and largest liabilities on record for that month. For the ten months of this year failures exceed those of any similar corresponding period, except for the years 1907 and 1914. It would seem as though we had gone through the worst of it, though our troubles are not yet over. On the other hand, our Federal Reserve System offers better protection to legitimate business than was ever before available in emergencies like the present. Our basic condition today is sound. We have recently harvested one of the largest crops in our history, as indicated by the following table, and there is ample wealth to insure prosperous times when some of the obstacles to this return are removed:

The well-known psychology of a declining market hardly needs comment here. Suffice it to say that the public awaits a return of commodity prices to something approaching pre-war level. An active buying market may be looked for when some stability attaches to the changed levels. It is hoped that the retailer will see the importance to his own prestige of adjusting prices to accord with the declining level. Thus far he has been reluctant to meet these losses and adjust himself to the changed conditions. This attitude would seem only to delay and possibly increase the losses which he must ultimately meet.

Anent the decline in prices, our superintendent of banks is quoted as saying: "The state, or bank, or the individual that undertakes to stand against this pressure may dam it for the moment, but will inevitably be overwhelmed."

LIQUIDATION DELAYED.

A stringent money market has had its somewhat depressing, but wholesome, effect upon all operations. Increased costs have necessitated credit extension. The high price of farm labor resulted in an unusually high average cost of foodstuffs, calling for heavy advances against staple commodities, which farmers are attempting to carry for a better market. Hence the usual heavy liquidation of debts to banks, which was expected during November and December, has been delayed, with the result that the banks are still using the Federal Reserve, when normally they

PROBLEMS SEEKING SOLUTION.

There are three outstanding problems which have an important bearing upon our return to normal business conditions; which still lack, but seem to be approaching, satisfactory solution. They are: Foreign exchange, the income tax, and a practical league to insure peace.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE.

Demoralization in foreign exchange rates has gone far to discourage foreign trade. Payment of four hundred millions on the Anglo-French debt in October, while demonstrating England's financial strength, might better have been deferred; as our mutual interests would seem to justify greater credit extension rather than contraction at this time. A trade balance in our favor of some $1,874,000,000 during ten months of 1920 has tended (notwithstanding heavy gold receipts from abroad) to decrease the purchasing power of Europe, and hence depress exchange rates.

Europe needs our raw material. We have a surplus and need much that she can produce. It is now our problem to finance this trade. The Edge law, which plans creation of corporations with large capital to loan against approved foreign securities, is one step in the right direction, which was endorsed at the recent convention of the American Bankers' Association at Washington, D. C., and referred to a competent committee for active support.

Another plan which has been advocated and may bring results is to form an association that will act as an agency to exchange commodities produced here and needed abroad for foreign commodities that would meet with a ready market here.

Some further relief has been accorded by shipments of raw material from this country to be manufactured in Europe for return in the manufactured form, or sold abroad and value accounted for out of proceeds from sale of the finished articles. A fair exchange of commodities between all the nations is urgently needed, both for humanitarian and business reasons; and we should feel a responsibility to aid in restoring foreign exchange rates as a means to this end.

THE INCOME TAX.

The income tax—an emergency measure that raised necessary funds in the war period—has been greatly criticized as inequitable, discouraging to all initiative, and unsound in principle. Furthermore, the maximum revenues collected from large war profits will be due to suffer heavy shrinkage while prices continue downward and losses are more or less general. Any tax that discourages business enterprise and incentive fails in its purpose by "killing the goose that lays the golden egg." A moderate, normal income tax is no doubt a fair means of raising part of the needed revenue. But the excess profits and surtax should be discontinued, or greatly modified. In its place a tax of say 1 per cent. on sales has been widely advocated as the most practical, equitable, and least burdensome plan yet evolved. Such a tax has become effective this year in France and seems to have demonstrated its practical working. A system that takes its toll in cash, out of paper earnings resulting from a rising market, and permits the creation of no reserve against certain losses that must attend later declines, seems wrong; because it taxes the producer unduly and undermines one of the first principles in business—that "in fair weather we should prepare for foul."

A LEAGUE TO INSURE PEACE.

The world is war-weary, and for generations will be paying for the follies and blunders of a few overbearing, autocratic war lords, whose lust for world dominance led all the nations of the world into conflict. There are those of all nationalities who took advantage of stress and widespread suffering to spread vicious doctrines of discontent that would substitute the red flag of anarchy for our Stars and Stripes. The league of nations, as drafted, was repudiated by the American people. But as a people we are liberty-loving and naturally progressive and law-abiding. Are we not great enough, in conjunction with other civilized races, to evolve some plan that will safeguard the world against any future conflict of arms? Let us put down the red flag and yellow journalism in no uncertain fashion, as the first and perhaps the most important step to this end; then get down to honest prices, fair taxes, and a fair exchange of our wares with the rest of the world. Barring internal strife, the greatest nation on the globe, with all the elements of native wealth, genius, intellect, and opportunity, has been marking time and accumulating energy to break all building and business records in the next five years.

From the standpoint of nutrition the goose egg is the leader, according to experimenters. The next in value are duck and guinea eggs, and the hen eggs comes fourth on the list.

Investment Banking in California Forging to Front and Taking Place as National Factor.

By GILBERT W. SMITH.

During the last twelve months we have experienced the greatest range of prices in standard investment securities of any similar period for at least ten years, probably for several decades. Good, safe bonds have been available during the current year at prices yielding from 7 per cent. to 8½ per cent. Not since the period following the civil war, when the purchasing power of money was low, could the same kind of bonds be purchased at equally attractive prices. Two peaks in the high price of commodities and the resultant high rates for money have been passed and we are now on the downward trend. It is believed that the trend of cheaper money will be slow in returning to normal rates because of the enormous amount of financing necessary to be undertaken in 1921 for foreign governments, our own industries, and public utilities.

The various foreign governments and their principal cities have borrowed in the United States during the last twelve months around $530,000,000. The following loans were underwritten in the United States during the last twelve months: $250,000,000 United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland 3-year and 10-year 5½s; $15,000,000 Cities of Bordeaux, Lyons, and Marseilles 15-year 6s; $50,000,000 Kingdom of Belgium 5-year 7½s; $25,000,000 Government of Switzerland 25-year 8s; $100,000,000 Republic of France 25-year 8s; $20,000,000 Kingdom of Norway 25-year 8s; $25,000,000 Kingdom of Denmark 25-year 8s; $6,000,000 City of Zurich 25-year 8s; $5,000,000 City of Bergen 25-year 8s; $6,000,000 City of Berne 25-year 8s. Because of the foreign exchange situation undoubtedly much additional foreign financing must be undertaken if transatlantic trade is to continue. It is estimated that twice the amount of financing that was done this year will be required during 1921.

Corporate financing for the month of October, 1920, recorded a total of $343,500,000 as against $101,000,000 in September and $387,000,000 in October, 1919. The same record of corporate financing for the ten months ending October 30th shows a total of $2,835,300,000, of which over $2,100,000,000 represented industrial financing. This is a remarkable record, considering the volume and the fact that money is still practically as tight as at any time during the year. Offsetting this new financing, of course, has been the payment of some issues such as the Anglo-French Loan, which released $400,000,000 for reinvestment. Also a large amount of domestic financing was required for the purpose of refunding maturing securities or paying off existing bank loans.

In the municipal market the average yield to the investor on bonds of twenty large cities of the United States on November 1st was 5.06 per cent. as compared with 5.18 per cent. on October 1st, 5.27 per cent. September 1st, and 4.49 per cent. November 1, 1919. The yield on these bonds, therefore, increased around 20 per cent. during the current year and has dropped back considerably from the high yield of two months ago. In volume there have been issued during the first ten months of this year $620,236,608 of long-term municipal bonds as compared with $770,195,248 for 1919, being the largest amount ever issued in any one year. This represents an increase of nearly 100 per cent. over the average amount of municipal bonds issued yearly prior to 1919. Temporary short-term municipal bonds in the amount of $461,929,093 have been issued for the first ten months of this year as against $450,093,607 for 1919. The municipal bond market has recorded a decided advance during the last two months. Today's market at present prices appears to be in a sound condition and there is little or no fear that the demand for tax-free bonds will be unable to take care of any reasonable volume of new issues.

The lowering of commodity prices and commercial contraction has reached a point to release a substantial amount of funds for investment and to indicate easier money conditions in the future. The market has become accustomed to handling large issues. The general advertising and offering of well-known securities by dealers throughout the country is resulting in a large number of new investors. The Liberty Loans undoubtedly assisted in this matter.

BANKING POWER OF CALIFORNIA.

The banking power of California, as expressed in the combined assets of the national and state institutions as of date June 30, 1920, is $2,440,487,000 (according to the report of Superintendent of Banks Charles F. Stein). Of this tremendous aggregate the assets of the state banks are $1,402,360,000 and the assets of the national banks are $1,038,127,000, giving an excess of assets in the state banks over those of the national banks of $364,233,000.

In the state banks the increase in assets for the fiscal year under discussion as compared with the preceding fiscal year was $272,926,544.75.

The aggregate of loans and discounts in the state banks as of June 30, 1920, was $772,213,880.41, an increase of $164,426,091.44. The aggregate loans in the state banks is greater than that of the national banks resident in California by the immense sum of $249,053,000.

The aggregate of individual deposits in the state banks of California on June 30, 1920, was $1,175,291,422.33, an increase of $227,958,001.48. The aggregate of deposits in the state banks of California is larger than the aggregate of deposits in national banks in this state by the sum of $545,842,000. The total number of depositors, both commercial and savings, in the state system as of date June 30, 1920, was 2,005,260.

At the close of the fiscal year our commercial banks and the commercial departments of departmental banks had in their pouches an aggregate of $267,519,547.81 in loans, an increase of $90,625,832.21 during the year, as compared with an increase in commercial loans of $21,367,297.10; the very remarkable expansion of the loaning capacity of our commercial banks is self-evident.

During the fiscal year our commercial banks and commercial departments of departmental banks uttered their acceptances only in the aggregate of $4,000,000. Compared with the national banks in California, this is a small aggregate and is due primarily to a resident disadvantage in our law. This I hope to have remedied by the presentation of an amendment to Section 80 of the Bank Act which will place our banks equally upon a footing with the national banks and open to them opportunities that they now enjoy only under certain unnecessary difficulties. The true acceptance, that which represents the financing of goods sold, is the highest type of credit instrument, mobile to the last degree and offering the best use of credit. I feel very confident that our commercial banks will utilize it to their fullest extent and without the abuse which in certain parts of the United States has crept into this business.

During the year the assets of our commercial departments of departmental banks increased their holdings in bonds, warrants, and other securities in the sum of $5,160,013.94, giving these banks an aggregate holding of $59,146,724.71. This very largely represents war paper and as such involves an element of inflation. It is a necessary present evil in our financial system, but our bankers are fully aware of its character and are eliminating it as rapidly as circumstances permit.

It is noteworthy that our commercial banks have to their credit eleven and one-half millions of dollars with the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco. They have reduced their overdrafts in a very material sum. They have decreased their holdings of bank premises, transferring this slow asset to their savings department. They have eliminated considerable part of other real estate. They have increased their capital that they may observe that provision of our law which establishes a relationship of 10 per cent. between capital and surplus on the one hand and deposit liability on the other. There is a large increase in bills payable, but the major part of it is with the Federal Reserve Bank and represents one of the exigencies of inflated finance. The relation of our commercial banks to the Federal Reserve Bank is healthy.

During the year the assets of our commercial banks and the commercial departments of departmental banks increased $108,384,800.75. Since June 30, 1920, to and including September 8, 1920, the assets of our commercial banks and of the commercial departments of departmental banks have increased $62,846,084.93, giving a total increase for the period from June 30, 1919, to September 8, 1920, is $117,230,885.68.

During the fiscal year from June 30, 1919, to June 30, 1920, the deposits in commercial banks and commercial departments of departmental banks increased $72,370,631.21. Since June 30, 1920, to and including September 8, 1920, the increase has been $44,972,767.83. The total increase in deposits, therefore, from June 30, 1919, to September 8, 1920, of $171,343,399.04, the most unusual increase for such a period in the history of the commercial banks and the commercial departments of departmental banks in California.

One of the most remarkable characteristics of the condition of the commercial banks and commercial departments of departmental banks in California is the increase in depositors. During the year this increase was 89,105.

During the preceding year, namely, the fiscal year from June 30, 1918, to June 30, 1919, there was in the commercial banks and in the commercial departments of departmental banks in California a loss of 12,620 depositors. Since June 30, 1920, to and including September 8, 1920, there has been an additional increase of depositors of 17,229, giving a total for the period from June 30, 1919, to September 8, 1920, of 106,334 depositors, which speaks very clearly of the expanding influence of the commercial banks of the state in the essential activities of financial, industrial, and mercantile life. On June 30, 1920, there were 575,865 depositors in the commercial banks and commercial departments of departmental banks of California, and on September 8, 1920, there were 593,094 depositors.

WORLD VIEW OF THE OIL SUPPLY.

Synopsis of Address by the Director of the United States Geological Survey.

The world needs more power. For present and future sources of energy we have to look to flowing water and the mineral fuels. Only about one-twentieth of the potential power of the world's rivers has been utilized, and over half of this in North America, with Europe credited with one-third and the rest divided between Asia, South America, Oceania, and Africa, in the order named. In its potential resources, however, Africa ranks, not last, but first; it has over 40 per cent. of the world's supply of water power and is followed in turn by Asia, North America, South America, Europe, and Oceania.

In the division of coal resources among the continents, at least of the better grades of coal, similar inequalities are seen: North America has more than half, Asia about a quarter, Europe a sixth, and the rest is divided between Oceania, Africa, and South America, in the order named.

The United States Geological Survey's estimate of the petroleum resources of the world shows that the distribution, while unevenly balanced among nations, is evenly balanced between the eastern and the western hemispheres.

More than half the world's oil reserves are believed to be concentrated in two intercontinental areas; one of these oil-rich provinces includes the North American and South American countries bordering the Caribbean Sea, and the other includes the countries of western Asia and southeastern Europe, with the Caucasus as an axis. On these two areas, then, comprising together only about 4 per cent. of the earth's surface and containing about 60 per cent. of the world's future supply of oil, is focused the attention of the great nations that most need oil.

In a review of the world's sources of energy—water and coal, as well as oil—we see North America taking first rank among the continents, with Asia a close second and Europe a poor third, although Europe has a much smaller area than either of the other two.

If we look at the power problem in our own country we are able to see in more detail the relative position of water, coal, and oil as sources of energy. Millions of horsepower, thousands of billions of tons, and billions of barrels are the measures of our nation's wealth in these three resources.

To compare these three resources: If we take fifty million horsepower as an average figure for the potential water power of the United States, without storage, we find that if fully developed and if used at the average load factor of today our rivers and streams would just about meet the country's present needs and would supply that amount of power for all time; moreover, with storage and an improved load factor they could provide a considerably increased output of energy to meet the growing demand.

If, however, we should put the whole burden on our coal mines, not using even the water power now used, we would find that by adopting the best steam practice of today the present power requirements of this country could be met with coal for 57,000 years, although we know that long before the end of that period the greater depth of the coal mines and their increased distance from market would alone create power demands for mining and transportation that would considerably cut down the amount of power available for other uses.

The comparison becomes more striking when we consider the adequacy of the petroleum reserves of the United States to drive the prime movers of the country. Again adopting the best steam practice of today as known in the largest public utility stations where fuel oil is used, and trying to carry the whole power load of the country with oil alone, we find that the oil reserves of the United States, although measured by billions of barrels, would last only nine years and three months.

Granted, then, that we have not enough oil to permit its use where either coal or water power can be had, we face the question of priority in use. First in any priority list must stand essential uses in which there are no

THE JAPANESE QUESTION IN CALIFORNIA.

By Rt. Rev. Edward Lambe Parsons, D. D.

California has had the usual problems of the foreign-born, but it has one of them in acute form. As forty years ago the Chinese were the objects of violent attack and the surest road to petty political success was by way of the "pogrom" directed against them, so it is today with the Japanese. The general task of Americanization in which they are included along with twenty other races takes on an entirely different aspect in their case. The way it happens would seem to be this:

Underneath there is that curious instinctive distrust of people whom we do not understand, or do not try to understand. Such distrust does not break out when things run smoothly, when there is nothing in which the other race interferes with our particular purposes. But it is always there, a survival of tribal days. It is the source of the various contemptuous names which we so readily apply to other races. It is the opportunity of unscrupulous politicians and of self-seeking leaders, whether they be editors of newspapers or representatives of labor or of commerce.

The sudden rise of Japan to be a world power lies against that background of racial distrust. Ever since the Russo-Japanese war men have looked across the Pacific and seen the yellow peril looming bigger and bigger. The militarists in America (that is the men who live by fear and not by faith) have concluded that a conflict is inevitable, thus responding in kind to the militarists in Japan. The yellow press has featured the yellow peril until distrust has slowly become active dread.

In such circumstances the California situation could readily be foreseen. Trouble arose in 1906-7 concerning the Japanese in the public schools. It was a small question but it strained international relations and led to the so-called Gentlemen's Agreement by which Japan undertook to prevent the emigration to America of her laboring class. But race feeling continued to be stirred. In 1913 the Alien Land Law was passed to prevent the Japanese ownership of land. In 1919 a new anti-Japanese campaign began. It has been conducted with extreme virulence and sometimes with extreme overstatement. It proposes a series of measures far more radical than any yet before the people. In the state it is fathering an initiative measure which would absolutely prohibit ownership or leasing by Japanese, the acquiring of any share in any company holding land, and the acquiring of land by any American-born minor (an American citizen of course) under the guardianship of a parent. Other features of the law would seem to make it easy to confiscate property already owned by Japanese.

This state program is a part of a larger one which would cancel the Gentlemen's Agreement in favor of an absolute exclusion law, bar Asiatics forever from American citizenship and amend the Constitution so that no child of Asiatic descent could ever become an American citizen.

Now in dealing with this situation the difficulty is not made easier by the fact that the main purpose of the agitation is right and desirable. What is wrong is the method, for hatred and distrust and intolerance are always wrong. What is vicious is that the leaders are frightening public sentiment into extreme measures which can only increase bad feeling, to gain an end which can be attained by moderate, just, and peaceful means.

The main purpose is to protect American life and standards which would appear to be threatened by any large body of Japanese, with their so different type of civilization.

It is better for America not to have its problem of Americanization increased tenfold. We have enough to do to unify our present heterogeneous population. By inviting Oriental immigration we simply increase our difficulties, and we do more, we imperil the peace of the world. We do that, because in the present state of public sentiment, so long as there is danger of the growth of the Japanese population we are always on the verge of racial outbreaks. It is not a question of what ought to be. It is a question of what is. The Japanese are peaceable, industrious, law-abiding, in the communities where they settle. Many of their near neighbors have only good words for them. But the fact remains that their presence, and indeed their very prosperity, make them a prolific source of conflict. So long as public sentiment is not satisfied that the menace of immigration of large numbers has been abated, so long we are in danger of international complications. For the peace of the world as well as for the good of our own communities, I believe that immigration from Asia should cease. There is here no question of equality or inequality of races. There is here no denial of the Christian faith that the peoples of the earth are all of God's great family and brothers. But even the most affectionate brothers among us normally find it wiser to bring up their families under different roofs. It is better for both Japan and America that there should not be an attempt to put too many of their children under the same roof, at least until they know each other a good deal better than they do now.

But what of the Japanese in California already? How are we to treat them? What is our responsibility towards them? We may begin by saying that we have treated them very badly. Our criticism has been most unfair. We condemn them if they buy land and settle. We denounce them if they send their money back to Japan, instead. We curse them for bringing their families and trying to get a "stake in the land." We curse them because they (or some of them) do the other thing. We say that they can not be assimilated to our political and civic and industrial life; and we never lift a hand to make the attempt. The attempt at least can and ought to be made. We must remember that the present Japanese population of California or of the United States can not in itself be a menace. We would be confessing ourselves weaklings and fools to think that American institutions are in peril because there are between 75,000 and 100,000 Japanese in California (the lowest estimates are about 72,000; the extreme agitators put it only at 100,000) and one or two score thousands more in the rest of the country. California has 3,600,000 inhabitants, according to the 1920 census. That is only one Japanese to thirty-five Americans even if there were 100,000 of the former. It might seem as if the thirty-five could manage the one without recourse to either violence or injustice. What we need in California is to stop growing panicky and take up our problem like sensible and Christian men.

To sum up: a true American policy is the same as a true Christian policy. It means an agreement with Japan in the interests of world peace to stop further immigration; and it means an honest effort to Americanize the Japanese already here. If such efforts have failed, we have no right to resort to what is essentially force.—Adv.

adequate substitutes. In view of the rapid increase in the employment of machinery first thought should be given to the unique function of oil—that of saving power. The world will always need a supply of lubricants, and as the demand will be an increasing one no adequate substitute for the lubricating oils and greases now derived from petroleum appears to be available. The kerosene lamp and even the fixtures burning oil gas or enriched water gas must eventually give place to the electric light.

The real competition comes in the relative claims of automotive gasoline and of fuel oil, for the larger yield of gasoline through more efficient cracking is gained at the expense of the fuel oil content of the crude oil. These two uses are already rivals, and we may expect refinery practice to be responsive to the automatic control of prices, which in turn ought to express relative demand.

The "flash point" in any discussion of priority in the use of petroleum products is reached when any curtailment in the use of gasoline by pleasure automobiles is suggested. Yet by every known rule of determining priority the nonessential use is the first to be regulated, and this use of a petroleum product as a luxury can find no economic justification in comparison with its commercial use. A more logical plea for motor fuel can be made, however, by the trucks that already form so large a part of our distribution system and the tractors that by the million will soon be helping to meet the world's increased demand for food. Truck and tractor must be given the first places in the long line of automobiles seeking motive power at the gasoline station.

Fuel oil is superior for use in transportation, and this use deserves priority over that for firing stationary boilers, for which coal should be substituted. Indeed, thoughtful regard for the future leads us to disallow even the claim of steam locomotives for fuel oil, for electrification of the railroads by water power alone or from water-power stations and steam stations linked together is now the obvious way to make the best use of our resources.

Austria, bankrupt in fuel, having lost her coal and oil, has begun to electrify half her railway mileage. Shall other nations wait until they, too, are bankrupt in oil before awaking to the need of a change in sources of power? The programme of conservation through electrification has started, and while this simply emphasizes our future dependence in larger measure upon coal it should at once make us abandon fuel oil as a source of motive power for our railroads and industries. In a word, the world has not oil enough to burn under either stationary or locomotive boilers. Even on the seas the best use should be made of the invaluable fuel. The marine steam engine, even of the turbine type, must give place to the heavy-oil engine, the internal-combustion engine of the Diesel type. The experience of the Bethlehem Steel Company is that its new oil-engine ore carrier, the Cubore, in continuous service between Cuba and Sparrows Point, Maryland, uses only 36.7 per cent. of the fuel oil consumed by a sister ship differing only in that it has the most modern type of steam plant. The tremendous economy thus possible in the marine consumption of fuel oil demands the immediate adoption of internal-combustion engines if the world wants to make the largest use of its oil resources for the longest time.

Commerce is more than exchange of commodities; it is the intercourse of nations, and through commerce nations associate. Oil as the best servant of commerce thus takes on large international interest. The same factors that make oil absolutely essential for naval use qualify it for merchant-marine strategy.

In September of this year, as in August, the daily output of the United States oil wells was slightly over one and one-fourth million barrels, but the daily consumption rose to one and five-eighths million barrels. This daily deficit of three-eighths of a million barrels was met by imports from Mexico.

In meeting the world's need for oil the United States has played a large part. In the last sixty years our contribution to the world's output of oil has been never less than 44 per cent. (the figure during the brief period when Russia led), and earlier reached even 99 per cent., while of the total eight billion barrels so far consumed by the world five billions have come from the wells of the United States.

There is urgent need of pioneering the world for oil to meet the needs of this generation, but there is no warrant for regarding this advance into new fields as beginning a contest whose aim is world conquest. The present need of the United States for oil from abroad can be met only by world-wide exploration, development, and operation by American companies backed up by our government; and we should expect other nations that are embarrassed by a similar or even greater discrepancy between consumption and production to adopt the same policy.

The end of Turkey is foreshadowed by the tripartite agreement entered into by Great Britain, Italy, and France last August, and made public recently.

OAKLAND, "CITY OF INDUSTRIES."

Though Essentially a Manufacturing Centre, Oakland Is Also a City of Attractive Homes.

By EUGENE BOWLES.

Only about a century and a half ago a troop of his Spanish majesty's conquistadores went marching over a field, "clank-clank-clankety-clank," for those were the days of the cuirass, the breastplate, the visored helmet, and the arquebus.

The glisten and the clangor of their "tin B. V. D.'s" startled a hear from his midday nap in the California sunshine. The hear took one look and ran away. The conquistadores took one look also and ran in the same direction.

The hunt continued up hill and down until night and a convenient cave cheated the meat-hungry conquistadores of their hear steaks à la Espagne.

Now, the field of that hear hunt is—if you will pardon a poor pun and slang that is worse—a "hear of a city." It is Oakland, which has taken to itself the sobriquet, "City of Industries."

Consider the picture of A. D. 1772 and that of today—1800 industrial plants displacing with their whir the silence of an unexplored land, the smoke of their chimneys painting a sky that was only tinged with the smoke of the tepee.

The best of reason exists for this metamorphosis. Here it is:

When old Mother Earth cooled off after the first seven days of time she left along the mainland of San Francisco Bay stretches of land ideally situated for manufacturing. Nature has run five transcontinental railroad routes right up to deep water. So hox-car can be shunted to ship-side and cargo-transfer can go ahead with a minimum of effort and a maximum of celerity. That is surely 100 per cent. efficiency.

Year after year the industrial sections have grown, at first slowly, in later years with growing rapidity, until in 1920 a total of sixty-five new industries, representing a capital investment of over $9,000,000, and providing for 4000 new employees, with an estimated addition to the annual pay-roll of $7,000,000, establishes a new record.

Industrial sites of an aggregate value of $768,000 and with a total of 116 acres were sold, and industrial building permits reached a total of $1,939,587, or an increase of $750,000 in twelve months.

Among the purchasers of industrial property were the Palm Olive Company, the Continental Can Company, the Scripps Booth Motor Car Company, and the Ajax Forge Company.

The launching of twenty-seven vessels with a total of 242,500 tonnage offers proof of the permanence of the shipbuilding industry in the East Bay cities.

The tendency of certain interests to centralize in a community is illustrated by the establishment of five furniture factories during the current year, while three new soap concerns, in addition to the one already established, have chosen Oakland as their home. Two enameling plants and two canning concerns were also added to the list.

The only clothes-pin factory west of Vermont is located in Oakland and has already become a business with a national market.

The largest single structure erected is that of the Western Milling Company, which includes concrete elevators and a concrete warehouse built at a total cost of $500,000.

A million-dollar corporation has just taken over this company's plant for the storage of hulk grain by the farmers of California. This corporation was formed by the Marketing and Grain Growers' Committee of the California Farm Bureau Federation.

The monthly report of the California Development Board makes the following comment upon this interesting development:

"This marks one of the most revolutionary and forward-looking steps in the history of California agriculture and points to a solution of many of the agricultural problems in a reduction in the cost of production and marketing grain, being beneficial, not only to the producer, but to the consumer."

Another important development is the new plant of the Coast Tire and Rubber Company. This company purchased choice industrial property at East Twelfth Street and Fiftieth Avenue, and has just erected a modern concrete building at a cost of $300,000 which is declared to be the most up-to-date tire factory in the United States.

The seven cities of the mainland—Oakland, Berkeley, Alameda, San Leandro, Piedmont, Emeryville, and Albany—form practically one big city, with a population, according to the 1920 census, of 315,889.

Though essentially a manufacturing centre, Oakland also is a city of attractive residences, natural scenery, and interesting drives. The late John Hay called it "the beauty spot of the world." Some of the outstanding features are:

The Skyline Boulevard, rated in Baedeker's Tourist Guide as the most beautiful drive in America.

Lake Merritt, the only salt water lake in the world inside a city limits; fed by the tides of the Pacific Ocean; a nationally protected refuge for wild ducks in the winter hunting season.

A "dome-less" city hall. Constructed on the office building plan, it rises to an extreme height of 433 feet, being the highest municipal building on the Pacific Coast and a mark over land and sea for many miles.

A Municipal Auditorium that is a real popular gathering place.

The leading shipbuilding centre of the Pacific Coast, one plant alone ranking next to Hog Island in size.

The hirthplace of the Liberty motor and the Union engine, the latter with a world's flight record in navy dirigibles.

The home of the war-time invention and its manufacture by which wireless conversation can be carried on between a flying airplane and the ground.

By reason of climatic conditions Oakland has been selected in recent years as the location of a large number of factories, many of them making products of national reputation. Some of the more important are: Automobiles; trucks and trailers; shipbuilding; cotton and woolen goods; dyes and chemicals; canned goods; syrups; washing machines; steel products; automobile tires; overalls; soft drinks; candies; coconut oil and copra products; marmalades and jams; power pumps; aviation engines and airplane parts; cooling and refrigerating apparatus; harmonicas; paper cans; paints and varnishes; steam packing and helting.

Shipbuilding is the leading industry, four yards employing 28,000 men out of an industrial population of 65,000. These yards built one-quarter of "the bridge to France" in the world war.

Fruit and vegetable canning is another important industry. Oakland canneries produce one-third of the Pacific Coast pack.

The transcontinental railroad routes having their Pacific Coast terminals in Oakland are the Union Pacific-Southern Pacific, the Sunset route and the Shasta route; the Western Pacific, the western link in the former Gould system, and the Santa Fé. Three ferry systems connect with San Francisco, running every ten minutes. The trip takes thirty minutes.

Alameda County is dotted with small and prosperous communities, ranging in population from 1000 to 6000, all tributary in business to Oakland. The population of the county is estimated at 400,000.

Oakland has 19,000 feet of improved water frontage, at which dock deep-sea and coast-wise vessels and river craft of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin.

The city government is conducted on the commission plan. The mayor is commissioner of public affairs. The other commissioners are in charge of the departments of finance, of public health and safety, of streets, and of public works. The five commissioners compose the city council, of which the mayor is president.

Oakland's school system has been declared by the educators to be the finest in California, and California has the reputation of leading the United States in educational facilities. There are forty-six primary and grammar grades and five high schools, with a total attendance of more than 40,000.

In addition there are fifty-seven private and parochial schools, including business and polytechnic colleges, young women's seminaries, preparatory, professional, religious, and music schools.

Oakland has eleven banks, with total resources of $113,721,000 and deposits of $105,262,000.

Electricity for lighting and power is obtained from great plants in the high Sierra, where it is generated by water power. Fuel gas is manufactured from crude petroleum, obtained from the great California field in the San Joaquin Valley and piped underground into Oakland. Practically all of the factories are run by electrical power.

Oakland's water supply is obtained from lakes in the foothills and deep driven wells. A recent analysis by an eminent Eastern chemist declared this water to be of the purest quality.

There are three daily newspapers in Oakland, all issued in the evening. The San Francisco dailies also maintain special staffs of reporters and advertising men in the cities on the mainland of San Francisco Bay.

There are thirty-one parks in Oakland, of a total area of 280 acres. The largest is the Joaquin Miller Park, named in memory of the "Poet of the Sierra," and situated on "The Hights," his late home.

["THE GIRL IN THE LIMOUSINE."]

This is a bedroom farce in which we see neither the limousine nor the limousine girl. They might better have called it "In Bed at Last," for the enterprising authors—Wilson Collison and Avery Hopwood—having originated, or seen outlined by other farce-writers of their calibre, numerous agitated excursions by compromised couples under beds, over beds, behind beds, in front of beds, in closets, or soiled clothes depositaries, likewise bathtubs, near beds, have finally taken the bull by the horns. In "The Girl in the Limousine" instead of the girl and the limousine there is a couple—not married—and a bed, into which the enterprising authors eventually place the pair in full sight of the audience. I find myself, after having seen numerous bedroom farces, pathetically unable to be shocked. Much sophistication in witnessing them tends to too keen a perception of when one is supposed to be shocked, which is fatal to shockedness. But lest any reader of mine is shocked at the damaging statement made concerning the couple in bed, I hasten to add that there was a chaperon present—an aunt just arrived from California—who mistook the gentleman so familiarly at home in Betty's bedroom for Betty's husband.

Never mind how or why he got there. Trust a farce-writer to manage that problem all right. Anyway he was there, attired only in his underclothes, plus Betty's dressing-gown. How funny! Ha, ha! At least that is the way we should feel.

The aunt from California seems to have acquired a great deal of determination from the life-giving ozone that flowed into her Californian lungs. At any rate, with much unwillingness on the part of the two victims, she coerced Betty and the underclothes man—who, she supposes, is Freddie, her nephew by marriage—into going to bed, because of the procession of sneezes they emit, due to being deprived of their outer integuments.

Aunt Cicely is an amateur nurse, and rejoices at the opportunity to air her theories. Behold, then, the two in bed. How dreadful! How the audience sniggers! How perfectly awful when Aunt Cicely turns out the light and leaves the disconsolate pair: Betty longing for Husband Freddie and Tony for Sweetheart Bernice.

However, the instant Aunt Cicely's determined back is turned the situation is saved by turning on the lights and the instant emergence of the presumably wedded pair from beneath the covers; or rather from beneath one silken cover, which has an eminently harmless appearance because Betty is in some highly ornate and well reefed-in pajamas, while Tony, besides rejoicing in the possession of his trusty if invisible underwear, also is modestly covered up by an extremely masculine-looking dressing-gown of Betty's; a voluminous, dull gray thing which the fluffy Betty would never, by any possibility, have had among her possessions.

You see the point. Get a couple into comically compromising straits. The remedy is right around the corner, but be blind and deaf to it. Make them and everybody in the piece of the most absolute respectability and the properest sentiments. Then have delightfully improper suggestion lurking under every other speech and action. And in the compromised ones' endeavors to emerge from their embarrassing predicament contrive a constant succession of comical, ridiculous exits and entrances, hidings in closets, under the bed, and in clothes chests. They always have huge, yawning clothes chests in these plays, nicely proportioned to accommodate the average man's shape. Of course the thing is so cleverly contrived, by experts in this line, that the situations are funny. And the girls are always dainty and smart, and lavishly endowed in the arm-and-neck line, and the players are rehearsed to a hair line in their well-timed in-and-out leaping and bedroom flights. And nobody could ever prove in a court of law that there was an improper word said or a prurient act outwardly suggested.

And yet these bedroom farces are, by their preponderance, demoralizing our stage. Two in a month is rather too generous an allowance, and I see that they have "Nightie Nightie" in prospect. Oh my goodness me! And there is such a thing in the East as real plays and fine players. And they don't dare, during these financially panicky times, to send anything to us more risky than such froth as this sort of thing.

Glorious San Francisco! Aint we just great here! Fine, classy people, you bet! Like the best of everything, including bedroom farces, demoralizing movies well advertised by grand, lovely posters contrived to brutalize the imagination of youth! Oh rot, everybody goes to the movies. And our politicians! Aint they just grand, genial men! And our courts of law! And our police that don't care a whoop about violated girlhood, but can get a very fine, complete, swift-working mad up when any of their number are hurt! Yes, we're an accommodating lot. We've got just the kind of city government we deserve in San Francisco, because we take it and keep it. The meek shall inherit the earth; six feet of it, and that's about all. Yes, dear old San Francisco knows bow; or says she does. Perhaps a few, though, are beginning to change their mind.

IBSEN'S LAST PLAY.

Ibsen's powers were waning when he was writing "When We Dead Awaken." He seems to have lost faith in the efficacy of his mission, and in a measure recanted, using symbolism to express his recantation. For in "When We Dead Awaken" the sculptor and his work are symbolical of Ibsen and his writings. We may then draw the conclusion that in those anxious months when the old poet drew heavily upon his waning strength in his anxiety to finish the play and leave in completed form his last message to humanity, the weary thinker, reviewing the story of his long life, recognized that in his devotion to his work and his mission he had not fully entered into his heritage of living the simple, normal life of joys and hopes and loving. For Ibsen, even after the long, bitter, trying years of poverty and repression were over, continued to live a singularly austere life. Humanity, profoundly though he studied it, intensely interesting though he found it, was not dear to him. He never loved it and failed to win the love that he could not give.

Thus, in the figure of the sculptor who had departed from his earlier pure ideal and who modeled portraits of people in which he subtly blended their inward affinity with gross animal traits by bringing out the animal resemblances, Ibsen seemed to be indicating his own depiction of such unlovely characters as Hedda Gabler and other warped and imperfect beings.

Perhaps the pure ideal he seemed to indicate that he departed from was the poetry and the poetic drama he renounced when he definitely abandoned poetry for the prose drama that made him world-famous. So the world, or the thinking part of it, can not accept with sympathy the dying dramatist's last message. For not only was Ibsen the man to send the first breath of life and real human nature through the stilted and artificial unrealities of the Victorian drama, but he has done much for woman. I think it was James Huneker who said that the sound of Nora closing the door on her old life in "A Doll's House" had reverberated through the world. That closing door helped to emancipate women from being chattels. That tragedy in "Ghosts" has done something—in America, at least—to right some of the hitherto unmentionable wrongs under which women had groaned for long centuries.

So we can not subscribe with sympathy to Ibsen's last message. The work that he did can not be spared, for, although he is now no longer a modern, his thought has wonderfully influenced the men and women of today.

"When We Dead Awaken" has never been a popular stage play, even in those European centres where the Ibsen drama has been most steadily presented. America, indeed, scarcely knows the play, except in printed form. All the more praise, therefore, to Mr. Arthur Maitland for his courage in putting on this strange and difficult play in his little theatre. It could not have been an easy undertaking to indicate on such a small stage the wild mountain scenery amidst which transpired the action of the last two acts. Nor is it a simple matter to present with credit a play so given over to symbolism and in which there is so little action. Yet both were very creditably done, the company at present being composed of the best material Maitland has yet had.

J. Anthony Smythe appeared as the sculptor who, oblivious of love in his devotion to art, had calmly dismissed from his life the model whose beauty he had utilized in his great statue, "The Redemption." (Here again we see the analogy to Ibsen's work.) Mr. Smythe looked like an elderly musician, and he and Audra Due—the latter playing the rôle of Maia, the young wife in whose spring-like charm the sculptor sought vainly to forget his spiritual death—were most satisfactory in presenting those earlier phases of the play.

Mary Morris, except for an almost unavoidable monotony of utterance in giving the long passages in Irene's dialogue in which is expressed so much of the symbolism of the play, also satisfied the imagination by conveying the mystic quality with which the character of Irene is so poetically charged. As in his other prose dramas, Ibsen adhered to realistic dialogue. But when it came to the character of Irene—who stands, I doubt not, for Ibsen's conception of the Ideal Woman that all imaginative masculine youth enshrines, and that Ibsen realized during those last, failing months of literary effort that he had neither sought nor found—the prose dramatist became poet again, and Irene's utterances are fitted only for those mountain-tops to which, at the end, she and the sculptor aspired.

It is all on a very transcendental plane, and the ordinary bonds and conventionalities of the social life fade quite out of sight.

There is, it is true, something of melodrama to the character of Irene, with her madness and her concealed dagger. But of that the practically dying author was no doubt unconscious. His satiric humor is entirely in abeyance in this play, which we must regard as something of a dramatic curio, almost unknown on the stage. Therefore we have reason to be proportionately appreciative of the opportunity afforded us for seeing it, even while we recognize that its sad, chill transcendentalism will leave the average theatre-goer in a semi-bewildered state.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

THE JOYCE KILMER READING.

A reading by Father Sesnon of a number of Joyce Kilmer's poems filled the Maitland Theatre to capacity on Thursday of last week. It can not be said that Joyce Kilmer is a great poet, but he is a cozy and lovable one. He gets on intimate terms with his readers, and therefore Father Sesnon's selection was a popular one.

As the reverend father is also very popular with the large contingent of San Franciscans who know and love him well the occasion was greatly enjoyed by his many appreciators. Besides being pleased at the opportunity for a acquaintance with the poems of the young journalist whose early death had so much of pathos in it, the audience was also well pleased to welcome on the platform as a social entertainer of another kind one who has publicly sung to them many times in the past for various beneficial purposes.

Father Sesnon is a very reverent and sympathetic appreciator of the works of the gentle poet. He read for an hour to his attentive audience, whose attitude was encouraging to a repetition by the reader of a recital on similar lines on some future occasion. His phrasing, touch, and inflection were effective and his audience went away well satisfied with an entertainment of merit and eager for some further display of Dr. Sesnon's powers.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Curran Theatre.

Sunday night will be the beginning of the second and final week of A. H. Woods' "The Girl in the Limousine" at the Curran Theatre.

The plot of the farce concerns itself with the adventures of Tony Hamilton, who in driving to a party—the hostess of which is a former sweetheart—stops on the road to give a lift to a forlorn-looking female who afterwards turns out to be a thug in disguise. With the aid of an accomplice Tony is knocked unconscious. The adventure occurs not far from the scene of the house party, and the unfortunate hero is disrobed by the robbers and is carried into the sleeping apartment of the hostess and finally left under the bed in which the lady is sleeping, suffering from an attack of the grippie.

Mr. Woods has furnished an exceptional company of skilled actors, experienced in this type of play. It includes John Arthur, Nancy Fair, William Halligan, Marion Ballou, George B. Connor, Barnett Parker, Archer Curtis, Anne Lorenz, Lee Kelso, Jane Seymour, and Edward Butler.

The Columbia Theatre.

Kolb and Dill are crowding the Columbia Theatre at every presentation of "The High Cost of Loving." The new production is quite an elaborate one and the stars, surrounded by a fine cast of popular favorites, keep up an incessant fun-making during the three acts of the comedy. The song revue preceding the third act is done by a chorus of pretty girls hewitchingly gowned and assisted by an orchestra under the direction of Leo Flanders.

The final performance of "The High Cost of Loving" will take place on Sunday night, the 26th instant, an extension of the engagement being impossible, as the company coming here direct from New York to present "Three Wise Fools" will open a limited engagement on Monday night, the 27th. This is the play that achieved a record run of 333 consecutive performances in the metropolis at the Criterion Theatre. John Golden, the producer, is sending the original cast, including Claude Gillingwater, Harry Davenport, Howard Gould, Donald Foster, Helen Menken, Millard Vincent, Wallace Fortune, Henry Forsman, Minnie Remaley, Harry Leighton, Herbert Saunders, and George Harcourt. "Three Wise Fools" is by Austin Strong.

The Orpheum.

Florenz Ames and Adelaide Winthrop will arrive here Sunday afternoon with their latest "Alice in Blunderland" as one of the important acts on next week's Orpheum bill. In this vaudeville brevity Mr. Ames and Miss Winthrop will combine farce and travesty. They are really funny and are naturally so. There is no straining for points.

Edith Clasper will present her delightful "Love Steps." She has every asset necessary to the successful dancer—appearance, youth, grace, abandon, and poetry. She will be assisted by two boys, Nelson Snow and Charles Columbus. The offering is handsomely staged and costumed.

Herbert Clifton, whose character impersonations are said to be flawless, will entertain with his travesties of the weaker sex. Several of his best impersonations are features of his number. One of his best is that of the scrub woman.

Billy Dale and Bunny Burch will bring back memories of one's first lessons in horsemanship in their original comedy creation, "The Riding Master." Dale is the author of the sketch, which deals with the laughable situations attendant upon learning to ride horse-back.

Pistel and Johnson will bring a breath of old-time minstrelsy in their offering, "The Stranded Minstrels." Their clean, wholesome, joyous picture of human nature, as nature exhibits herself in the colored race, is one of the best things of its kind in vaudeville.

Walter Ward and Ethel Dooley, a sprightly, well-balanced pair, will offer, under the caption, "What Can We Do," a versatile number consisting of dancing, singing, bicycling, and an exhibition of lariat throwing.

Barnes and Freeman, two justly popular comedians, will have as their vehicle "A Pressing Engagement," described as the best mixture of songs and dances they have yet assembled.

Bert and Lottie Walton, "the Sunshine Pair," will do a double dance with a budget of amusing yarns. Youth, charm, and class are notable characteristics of their work.

Victor Moore, Emma Littlefield, and company will remain one more week with their revival of "Change Your Act or Back to the Woods."

The Maitland Playhouse.

"The Marriage of Kitty," an amusing French comedy adapted to the English by Cosmo Gordon-Lennox and made famous through the efforts of Marie Tempest, who starred in this play both in London and New York City, will be the Christmas week attraction at the Maitland Playhouse.

It is particularly well adapted to the season. The story is that of a young French girl who has lost her fortune and must seek work. Her close friend, a harrister, suggests marriage as a way out of her difficulties. A marriage of convenience is arranged, but the young bride makes herself as unprepossessing as possible.

Later the husband sees his wife under more attractive surroundings in her villa on the shores of Lake Geneva. Then he makes love to her and finally they become man and wife. There are many clever lines, numerous laughable situations.

For the remainder of the week the Maitland company will continue to present that latest of Henrik Ibsen's dramas, "When We Dead Awaken."

The Alcazar Theatre.

"The Things That Count" is the Alcazar's selection for Christmas week, commencing next Sunday matinee. Alice Brady scored nearly a solid year of success in it at her father's New York Playhouse. This is its first San Francisco release. The love story is beautiful and there is a sparkling Christmas tree scene among the simple, kindly folk of New York's East Side that resounds with mirth and melody and the glad laughter of happy children. There are sixteen splendidly human characters, distinct types, in the reinforced cast including Dudley Ayres, Elwyn Harvey, Emelie Melville, Emily Pinter, Edna Peckham, Anna MacNaughton, May Nannery, Rafael Brunetto, Al Cunningham, Charles Yule, and a bevy of California's cleverest juvenile players. The Union League Club has taken the house for a Monday night theatre party of its own membership, and has arranged for an extra Christmas morning matinee at 10:30, when children will be the guests of this public-spirited organization.

"Come Seven," founded on Octavus Roy Cohen's magazine stories of modern Southern negro life, will be the New Year's week attraction, beginning Sunday, December 26th, with two performances at 7:30 and 9:45 New Year's Eve. It will be a novel surprise to see all the Alcazar favorites appearing in blackface. There are no white characters in this farcicality, to be staged for the first time outside of New York, where it recently scored a great hit at the Broadhurst Theatre.

"Pomander Walk," that delightful and wholesome comedy by Louis Napoleon Parker, will be the holiday week attraction at the Maitland Playhouse, commencing with Tuesday, December 27th. It was particularly selected for this time of the year.

VANITY FAIR.

We learn with a certain sense of dismay that the Prince of Wales is twenty-six years of age and that no arrangements have been made to find him a wife. It says so in the newspapers. Why, when we ourselves were twenty-six years of age we had already contracted an alliance—but we will draw a veil over an event that, strange to say, was received with something like apathy by a large majority of the human race.

The London Times is now drawing attention to the unmarried state of the Prince of Wales. It hopes to be able to do this with delicacy and reticence, although how there can be any delicacy and reticence about a Times editorial threatening an innocent and modest young man with condign matrimony it is hard to say. But the Times, on behalf of the public, disclaims any intention to use compulsion in the matter. Far be it from the Times to exercise pressure or to suggest that the prince's marriage be made a matter of policy. Marriage, says the Times, even the marriage of a prince, should be the presage of true happiness. So it should. We are all agreed about that, and so we allow the axiom to pass with a sort of cross between a sigh and a grin. The marriage of the Prince of Wales must be one of inclination, but it would be well for him to incline somewhat speedily and perhaps in some direction that may be persuasively indicated by those who manage such matters in royal circles. The prince's grandfather was married at twenty-five and his great-grandmother was married at eighteen. The prince should choose a wife speedily, and perhaps it would be just as well if he were to choose the wife chosen for him. It might save difficulties in the long run.

But a change has come o'er the spirit of the European dream so far as royal marriages are concerned. There was a time when the procedure was much more simple than it is today. All that was necessary in the case of a marriageable prince or princess was to drop a note to the German court with the question, "What have you in stock?" And there was always something. The supply was invariably equal to the demand. An assortment of German princes and princesses was always on hand, and orders were fulfilled with promptness and dispatch. "We strive to please" was the motto of the German court in matters matrimonial. But all that has been changed. as Molière's physician remarked when he was reminded that the heart used to be on the left side of the body. No one seems to know the present whereabouts of the German princes and princesses. No one wants to know. They have all vanished into the ewigkeit, wherever that may be. And there is no rival establishment with anything like a similar supply. It is a bear market in royalties with a general depression in the usual sources of supply. There had been some talk of the Grand Duchess Tatiana of Russia, but she, poor, pretty little thing, lies somewhere dead of a Bolshevik bullet, and we sincerely trust that the name of the demon who killed her has been blotted from the Book of Life. And then there was the Princess Yolanda of Italy, but she is no longer being mentioned for some reason or other. Public opinion in Great Britain seems to think that the prince would do well to marry some one of his own race, and preferably some one who is not of royal blood. The royal enclosure just now is not so sacrosanct as it used to be.

Probably there would have been no more German marriages even if the war had not intervened. Already there was a strong sentiment against them. It was felt that the German royal family was becoming a little too universal. Certainly there will be no more of them now. It is fairly safe to assume that the Prince of Wales will not marry a princess, but so far there is nothing to indicate in what direction his inclination will be turned.

The friend of many children died recently in Brooklyn, New York. He was Jesse A. Crandall, eighty-six years old, a toy designer and manufacturer. He made a hobby horse for the Prince of Wales, later King Edward VII, and an invalid chair for Ruth Cleveland, daughter of the former President.

Dr. Pasticci, a noted chemist, has discovered a method of cheaply producing liquid hydrogen. It may be used in driving automobiles, one gallon being sufficient for 250 miles. It also may be utilized in railway locomotives and in the engines of ocean steamers, he declares.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Tom Cranfil of Texas, prominent in oil circles of late, tells the following on a minister who had discovered oil on some land he owned. The minister invited some of his deacons to go with him to the new field, so that they might share in the opportunities. They were breakfasting at the local eating house and had decided that they would order chicken. When a waitress, a calicimined and peroxidized miss, came up, the minister inquired, "How is the chicken this morning?" "All right, kiddo!" she retorted. "How are you?"

Sandy McNabb took a sixpenny ticket in a raffle for a pony and trap. He won it. Was he pleased at his good fortune? Not a bit. When the pony and trap were brought to him, he surveyed them gloomily, and said: "I tell ye the whole thing was a swindle." "What's the matter?" asked his friends. "Where's the whip?" demanded Sandy.

William J. Burns, the famous detective, was greatly displeased with the work of one of his men and by way of a hint presented him with a book of "Sherlock Holmes." "I guess this means that if I took enough coke I'd be a great detective," sneered the man. "I'm sorry, George," said Mr. Burns shaking his head sadly, "but I'm afraid there isn't that much coke."

A British merchant who has just been the guest of the Sultan of Zanzibar was invited to inspect the harem. In the garden was a merry-go-round that the Sultan had imported at great expense from the United States. Several of the wives were mounted on the wooden horse. "There's Only One Girl in This World for Me" was the tune that was being played by the organ.

From giants the conversation had turned to dwarfs, and the various accomplishments of the various Tom Thumbs had been related at length. Then the club liar hustled in. "All those dwarfs you've mentioned are right enough," he declared airily, "but none of them can compare with a stunted specimen I once came across in the wilds of Central Africa."

The audience began visibly to dwindle. "Now, he was short, if you like," continued the club liar, speaking rapidly. "I know you are a set of unbelievers, so I will not venture to give you his height in actual inches; but I will tell you this, friends—that the man was so short that every time his corns hurt him—" "Well?" queried the only member of the audience who remained. "Every time his corns hurt him," repeated the narrator, "he fancied he had a splitting headache."

An actor-manager was being shown around a lunatic asylum. Seated under a tree in the garden was a man who was counting his fingers again and again, muttering: "Eeney, meeny, miney, moe." "Who's this?" asked the actor. "A strange case, sir," replied the attendant. "We found him in the street. He's harmless, but hopelessly insane." The actor looked at the lunatic closely, while the attendant moved away. "Bless my soul!" he exclaimed presently. "He resembles a former member of my company." "Tell me," said he, addressing the lunatic, "aren't you Bawl, the actor?" "Cheese it," whispered the lunatic. "If they don't find me out, I can stay here all the summer rent free."

"He was a big game hunter, and he had inserted an advertisement in a morning paper asking if any man would accompany him to Central Africa to shoot lions, rhinos, hippos, etc., the said companion to hear half the cost of the expedition. Late that night, or rather at 2 o'clock the next morning, his household was awakened by a violent ringing of the front door bell, and a man was admitted who, to put it mildly, appeared to have been wining. "Look here," explained he, "I read your 'vertisement this mornin', and I was bound to come to you." "Well?" queried the hunter. "It's a bit late to talk business, but will you accompany me?" "Company you?" retorted the visitor. "No, thir. I call to tell you I'd shee you hanged first."

THE MERRY MUSE.

Unimportant Places.

Let other hardlings twiddle the lyre
To dear dead cities, in minor key—Nineveh, Karnak, Sidon, and Tyre;
None of them, somehow, appeals to me.
I sing of Sauk Center and Huckleahee,
Jacksnipe, Pedee, Scuffletown, Dutch,
Bughall, Quidnunc, and Bermidji:
Towns that never amounted to much.

If deadness be the poets desire,
Think on Yamhill and Chicopee;
Pismo pleads for the funeral pyre;
Consider the canning factor-ee
That never came, or the library
Of Shaghticoke, or the euphonious touch
Of ultra-deadness in Oloee:
Towns that never amounted to much.
Gabbetsville, Suncook—some of the choir
Were cursed by fate from their infancy.
How could Adobe or Weed aspire
To the civic grandeur of Almuche?
But Energy, Aimwell, and Sesame
Should have escaped Time's scolding clutch
And thriven like Hyssop, Yell, and McGee,
Whereas they never amounted to much.
Brakeman, proclaim them right lustily:
Whitcom, Coyote, and Clutterhutch,
Tanner's Bottom and Whiffitree:
Towns that never amounted to much.

Symphony Orchestra.

Tomorrow afternoon in the Curran Theatre the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra will give the sixth Sunday symphony concert of the season, repeating the splendid programme offered yesterday. This week's programme is made up entirely of the works of Beethoven in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the great master's birth, December 16, 1770. The soloist on this occasion will be Louis Persinger, who will play the violin concerto in D major. This is Mr. Persinger's first appearance as soloist here this season. The programme will open with the "Egmont" overture, while the latter half will consist of the exquisite Seventh Symphony. This symphony, a favorite among concert-goers, has been termed by Wagner as "the apotheosis of the dance" because of the general mood of the entire work and the persistently marked rhythm which pervades each movement.

There will be no concert on the following Sunday, December 26th, as that week has been set aside as a short vacation period for the orchestra. The season will be resumed with the pair of symphony concerts of December 31st and January 2d.

Louis Graveure.

Louis Graveure, today the foremost baritone in America, will be heard in song recital at the Scottish Rite Auditorium on Tuesday night, January 18, 1921.

As Mr. Graveure is a student of music, so he is a student of the plastic art, and of philosophy, and of history, and of political economy, and of life generally. He is at home in a metropolis or in the wilds of the Canadian Northwest, and he can enjoy himself thoroughly in either place. He can ride, hunt, and swim. He loves sports and believes in them. He does not preserve his voice by coddling either himself or it, but by keeping himself so perpetually fit that he is able to undergo any ordinary strain or hardship without turning a hair. In consequence Mr. Graveure has no "spells" or "temperament" and no off nights. He is a man among men who commands the respect of men. He can work hard, give his audience the very best that is in him intellectually and vocally, and by next daylight he is ready for a ride on horseback or for a trip around a golf course.

Guests are limited to one hundred, and Mr. Bennett announces that a limited number of reservations may be made for the fortnight following New Year.

Walls of Ancient Tiberias.

Biblical scholars everywhere will be greatly interested in a chance find made in Jerusalem in August of this year by some Jewish workmen who were building a wall for the Palestine government. In their excavations preparatory to the building they came across ancient walls and columns, and one of their overseers, an intelligent fellow, carried the information at once to Jerusalem. The location of the spot was such that he suspected that the ruins of some important Old Testament edifice had been found.

Work was ordered stopped and the director of the Department of Antiquities went to the place with members of the Jewish Exploration Society. Preliminary digging was done and a thorough study of the ground, the investigation convincing the men that they had found the site of the ancient Tiberias, a place which has such great association both with Christian and Jewish history. That it is near the modern Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee is, in itself, enough to promise important historical light.

The Palestinian government granted permission to the Jewish Exploration Society to go ahead immediately, and uncover the ruins. Rapid progress is being made. The excavators have no doubt of the importance of their find and will be able shortly to draw up a plan of the ancient city, as opposed to the present-day stronghold of Arah and fleas. Tiberias, at the present time, is notorious for its fleas. The king of fleas is said by the Arah to hold his court in Tiberias.

TALKS ON INSURANCE

Insurance—a legacy that must go where intended

Life insurance must be paid to whomever directed.

There is no chance for quibbling nor lawsuits.

The payment is immediate; no waiting or delays, as is often the case with real or personal property.

The beneficiary receives all of the insurance and pays no state inheritance tax and only a Federal tax on amounts over $40,000.00.

Delays of litigation, legal interference by antagonistic or selfish persons, lost or misplaced deeds, or failure to find a will—none of these interfere with the payment of life insurance benefit.

The complete security of life insurance is just commencing to be fully appreciated. Insurance protection is one of the most fascinating and absorbing subjects. It would be to your advantage to learn of some of the unusual instances where insurance has played an important, a vital part in the happiness and security of a business or a family.

Supervisors and Sinn Fein.

The board of supervisors, acting in coöperation with Mayor Rolph, has seen fit to pass a series of resolutions extolling the life and death of Mayor MacSwiney and expressing a hope for the success of the Sinn Fein cause. The resolutions were drawn by James E. Power, Richard J. Welch, and Warren Shannon.

Mayor Rolph and the supervisors by this action have been guilty of a piece of impudence. They were elected to administer the business of the city—which, by the way, they grossly neglect and mismanage—and not to be the spokesmen of San Francisco's sentiments or to meddle in the affairs of a foreign nation and one with which this country is practically in a state of alliance. They are well aware—if they have intelligence enough to be aware of anything—that their opinions on the subject of the Sinn Fein are held in detestation by most of the decent elements of the city. Mayor Rolph is not an Irishman. It may be doubted if he has any sincere sentiment for the Sinn Fein cause, if only because he has no sincere sentiment for any cause except that of his own political fortunes. His defense of the Sinn Fein was actuated by precisely the same motives as those of his henchmen and familiars who defended the gangsters. The mayor and most of the supervisors, in point of fact, were engaged in their usual occupation, the only one that they understand, of hunting for votes.

That this involved an injury to their own country and an insult to the city did not matter to them at all.

The incident is but another illustration of the intolerable evil to which the public attention is now being directed, the evil of government by cheap and mean men, by political prostitutes who win their offices by fawning servilities and who hope to retain them by catering to foreign influences. There will be no good government in San Francisco until the whole crew has been swept away.

Jimmies and Hiram.

Now that we are in a fair way to punish a few criminals and to disgrace a few of their official confederates it may be well to pay some attention to the roots of this disease as well as to its fruits. To push a few criminals out of sight, into jail or elsewhere, is an eminently proper proceeding. It would be still more proper to disinfect the soil from which they spring and to destroy the cause as well as the result. Indeed, unless we can do this, all our sound and fury will go for nothing.

There can be no kind of question as to the malady with which we have to deal. The arrest of the gangsters was followed by instant efforts to secure their liberation, and these efforts came from members of the mayor's official family. They came so quickly, so impudently, and so unblushingly that they were evidently parts of a regular routine. They seem to have been regarded as the formalities usual in such cases, as indeed they were. The municipal machine began to work automatically in aid of its friends, and the district attorney, presumably to discount the customary farce, told us of mysterious political influences that were already on the move to frustrate the prosecution. In point of fact the regular City Hall programme was to be played, and it would have been played to the appointed end but for the explosion of public anger. It has been played a hundred times in the past, but never quite so impudently as under the incentive of Mayor Rolph, who established the principle that laws on the one hand and immunities on the other are no more than counters for the winning of votes.

But there was another event even more significant, but not so sensational. Senator Phelan's secretary admitted under oath that he had connived at the defeat of the criminal law by conveying a warning of an intended effort to enforce that law. As in the case of the city officials who came to the relief of the gangsters, the culprit seemed to have no idea of the gravity of his offense. He appeared to regard it as a matter of course, as something to be taken for granted, as a part of the usual procedure, as something that had been done a dozen times before, that was usually done. He is said to have been disconcerted by the comments of the judge, to have been surprised, as though some established principle had been attacked. There can be no doubt that he was disconcerted and surprised. He had been acting in the interest of a great political machine, and he had the usual contempt of the politician for a law that may sometimes be used for the getting of votes, but that must never be allowed to defeat that end. He was playing on a large scale the same game that Mayor Rolph played upon a smaller scale. He was a mere expression of the debauchery of the official conscience. His action was far worse than that of the briber who demoralizes and degrades an individual, for he demoralized and degraded the public service, and he did it as though it were part of a regular and established practice. And who can doubt that it was?

It is thus evident that we have to deal not so much with events as with a condition. To deal with events is comparatively easy. To change a condition is not so easy. But of one thing we may be well assured.

The events will recur so long as the conditions persist. So long as we elect officials who are willing to use crime and criminals in their political business, so long we shall have crime and criminals to contend against. So long as we tolerate and perpetuate these roots of evil, so long we shall be periodically horrified by their inevitable fruits. So long as we elect Rolphs and Johnsons, "Jimmies" and "Hiram," just so long we must expect the debasement of our political and municipal systems with the poison of venality filtering down through officialism, down and down to its goal in Howard Street. Actually it is not the gangsters from which primarily we are suffering. We are suffering from the "Jimmies." They are the fons et origo of our political evils.

Why do we elect these men? Why do we tolerate their election? Are we actually as a people so poor in character, in ability, in worthiness, that we can find no alternative to these wretched little schemers, that we are forced into the highways and byways of our social life to select candidates doomed to disgrace by their own moral infirmities? America has as many men of the front rank as any country in the world. San Francisco has as many men of the front rank as any city in America. How is it that they are not brought to a service that they would certainly adorn? There was a time when San Francisco placed in the City Hall such men as Van Ness, Otis, Alvord. They conferred upon their office a greater distinction than their office conferred upon them. How is it that we have fallen so low as to accept such creatures as Schmitz and Rolph? Have we lost our civic ideals that we thus tranquilly permit the elaboration of a vast mechanism of debauchery by those to whom public office is no more than a disreputable trade, bartering with criminals for their votes, paying for votes with immunities, with protection, and with acquittals? It is bad enough that such abominations should exist. It is a thousand times worse that we should become used to them, that we should regard them as normal, as parts of the established order of things.

There is, of course, a remedy, and we have by no means applied that remedy by sending a few thugs to prison nor by removing a few official groundlings. If that is all we intend to do we may be sure that in a few weeks we shall be precisely where we were before, and that the old infamous mechanism will be at work again. We are told that one of the gangsters was anxious for the postponement of his trial until the public excitement had cooled. He was wise. He knew exactly what would happen. He knew that a postponement meant escape, that the old game would begin again at once through the iniquitous circle of bail bonds, the subornation and disappearance of witnesses, and the benevolent acquiescence of his judicial confederates on the bench, inspired by winks and nods from the City Hall. All this is none the less likely to happen because of anything that has yet been done. We have been mesmerized often enough by the "cleaning up" process, by all the humbug of "probes" and "disclosures" and "revelations." It ought not to be possible to do it again.

No reform will be possible until the decent elements of the city shall determine through their organizations that the old order of things must die. There are organizations and to spare for such a purpose. There are many commercial and civic clubs with large memberships of reputable men. The women clubs are much more numerous. All of these organizations profess to have the good of the city at heart and undoubtedly they are sincere. But in the main they have been running on the wrong tack. They have contented themselves with scanning the lists of candidates presented to them and trying to determine which among them were the least villainous. They have done little or nothing toward the selection of the candidates. They have taken the disgusting bill of fare as it was presented to them and have tried to select its least nauseating items. But how do these candidates become candidates? Who fills the rogues' gallery? Whence comes the initiative? Who makes the choice?

These organizations have now an opportunity that must be quickly seized if it is to be seized at all. Let them take the reins in their own hands. Let them make their choice of good men instead of waiting to make a compulsory choice from among bad men. Let them select suitable candidates and then assure them of united and determined support. They can elect any man they please to any office they please. The great mass of voters would follow them willingly, and rejoice to be delivered from the dominion of evil. It is lack of leadership, lack of assertion, that has led us into this bog. The decencies of the city have been inarticulate. The organizations already exist. All that they need is a connecting thread and the spirit of initiative. They have talked much of democracy, perhaps overmuch, and our own municipal expression of democracy has become a scorn and a hissing. They have now an opportunity to show that an awakened democracy can first find good men and then elect them.

Churches and Laws.

The Argonaut disclaims the suggestion of a casual correspondent that its comments upon the Sinn Fein movement in America and upon the political activities of the Roman Catholic Church are either an imitation or a continuation of the methods of the late Mr. Pixley. They are neither the one nor the other. They are in no sense an inheritance. The Argonaut has a profound respect for its founder, but it does not allow itself to be influenced by policies or by pleas belonging to another day and generation, and therefore irrelevant to present conditions and to a wider and more liberal thought. It has no traditions except those common to good-will everywhere.

For the Roman Catholic Church the Argonaut has a sincere respect. Otherwise it would not have troubled to warn it against those political aberrations that are deplored by thousands of its most able adherents all over the country, and that must, if unchecked, prove fatal to the beneficences that it is so well equipped to accomplish. The Argonaut was inspired, not by hostility toward the church, but by regret that its religious and social aims should be in danger of frustration by the intrusion of elements foreign to its legitimate activities, provocative of needless animosities, and certain to result in the estrangement of many of its most devoted friends.

The Roman Catholic Church in America has a field of impressive magnitude and fertility in which to work. Perhaps there is no other religious field so large or so promising. Nothing but the gravest errors of policy can loosen its hold upon innumerable Americans born within its fold and taught to rely upon its guidance for the spiritual inspiration that in one form or another is essential to us all. But it is among the ever-increasing masses of our foreign population that the church may find its greatest opportunities. Suddenly released from the restraints, the conventions, perhaps the tyrannies, of Europe, they are often in emergent need of those ministrations tending to self-discipline, to moderation, and to all those virtues that are none the less religious because they are also civic. Large numbers of these people, perhaps a majority of them, are Roman Catholics. The religious influence, beyond all question, is the weightiest that can be brought to bear upon them. It can sway them so easily in the direction of good citizenship, or it can sway them with equal ease toward the perpetuation of feuds and the search for vengeance that must always be hateful to a true Christianity. The agencies of secular government can do much for the immigrant, but the church can do much more. In the broadest and best sense there can be no good citizenship without religion, because there can be no good citizenship without self-control, an enlightened altruism, and a respect for others. These virtues are eminently Christian. Religious systems must stand or fall by the personal conduct of their adherents, and not by the force of their creeds. The religion that engenders hate or violence is doomed. Surely nothing can be more axiomatic than that. That so great a church as the Roman Catholic should permit a few turbulent political priests to endanger its spiritual eminence would be no less than a tragedy. To associate a rebuke of those priests with an assault upon the church is no less than an absurdity. If this be indeed an assault upon the church, then it is an assault in which large numbers of the best Catholics in America have participated.

The Argonaut does not believe that the Catholic Church in America will allow itself to be bogged in Sinn Feinism. It does not believe that the Catholic Church in America will allow itself to be identified with a foreign quarrel, or that it will allow itself to be degraded into an instrument of insult against a friendly power. The Roman Catholics of America, if only from the fact of their world associations, are well aware that the fate of the human race is even now in the balances, more critically in the balances than at any other time in human history. They know that civilization is assailed by the most awful forms of terrorism of which there is any record, and that good government everywhere is staggering in the quicksands that may so easily swallow it. They know that the hope of the race is to be found in a sympathetic understanding between the English-speaking nations, that here, and here alone, is the ark of salvation to be attained. They know that the fall of the British Empire would mean the submergence of the old world under Asiatic floods, that it would mean a carnival of blood and agony for the race and from which there could be no escape anywhere. Is it likely, is it possible, that Roman Catholics will allow a sectarian animosity, an ancient feud, an inherited prejudice, no matter how well founded, to loosen such an avalanche as this? Is it likely that they will stand by consenting while such a crime is committed? The Argonaut does not believe it. If that is anti-Catholicism, so let it be. But it is not.

Political agitations ought not to be conducted upon religious grounds. We have had far too much of it. It is an infringement of the spirit of the Constitution. If a religious organization can be drilled and disciplined to the consummation of some political aim, then to all intents and purposes we have an established church. If the Roman Catholic Church is identified with the Sinn Fein, which of course it is not and never will be, if through such identification it can control our elections, then the Roman Catholic Church becomes the real government of America. If the Methodists or the Congregationalists or the Episcopalians can enforce by law their own specific religious opinions, or practices, or ideas, or foreign policies, then we have an established church. When religious communities go to the polls with religious labels around their necks, drilled and disciplined to vote as religious communities, then the cause of religious liberty is assailed, and a religious despotism is upon us. The object of religion is to inculcate an individual decency, to persuade to an individual self-control, honor, dignity, harmlessness. Organized religions have no right to a political ticket. It will be the worse for them if they insist upon adopting one. They have no right to demand that the laws be adapted to their creeds. The Christian Science Church, for example—and it is a pertinent example—has no right to demand that the laws of hygiene be set on one side because they do not happen to coincide with its religious convictions. The Christian Scientist Church has no right to beat its ecclesiastical drum and to demand, as a church, that the laws of vaccination or sanitation be abrogated because it has a religious belief that they are unneeded. It has no more right to do this than the Episcopal Church, as such, would have a right to demand free silver or a protective tariff. The individual Christian Scientist may vote in any way that he pleases. So may the individual Roman Catholic or Episcopalian. But we do not look with favor upon an array of churches, each clamoring for its pet laws and demanding that its creeds be enforced by the police. Fortunately very few churches have done this, and those who have done it will find their Nemesis.

And it may be said furthermore and in conclusion that if the churches were to devote all their efforts to turning bad men into good men, bad citizens into good citizens, sinners into saints, there would be a lessening need for laws of any kind. Not only the Irish problem, but most other problems would solve themselves.

Senator Harding and Mr. Bryan.

Senator Harding's conference with Mr. Bryan was the natural and proper act of a statesman anxious to know all that is to be known on the conduct of foreign affairs and the part played in those affairs by those who had responsibilities in connection with them. Mr. Bryan for a brief period was Secretary of State. It was a position that he ought never to have filled, that he had not the capacity to fill. But there were other positions filled by far more unsuitable men, by Mr. Baker, by Mr. Daniels, and by Mr. Burleson. Mr. Bryan need not fear comparison with either of them. Moreover, we may usefully remind ourselves that during his tenure of office Mr. Bryan was instrumental in the writing of many arbitration treaties to which no word of objection has ever been said. They were not spectacular achievements. They did not arouse the attention of the world nor provoke storms of dissent as did the league of nations. None the less it is probable that these treaties were solid and enduring contributions to the cause of peace, and Senator Harding therefore showed an enlightened good sense in acquainting himself with the views of their author and inspirer.

For the rejection of the league of nations certainly does not mean that America is to hold herself aloof from concerted efforts to avoid war. Indeed it is quite certain that plans of some sort are already being elaborated, although their nature has, quite properly, not been divulged. They may take the form of a codification of international law as recommended by Mr. Root. They may take the form of an extension of arbitration treaties and the cautious stiffening of their provisions. But something will be done. We need have no doubts about that. Europe is not enamored of the league of nations. If we may judge from her newspapers she looks upon it with indifference. It is as nearly impotent as such an association can be. America, by the fact of her abstention, has put herself in a position to assume the moral leadership of the world and to do so without the sanctions of force with which the covenant is saturated. That Senator Harding should talk with Mr. Bryan is but one more evidence of the place that the cause of peace holds in his mind.

Editorial Notes.

The plea on behalf of the Children's Hospital that appears in another column of this issue ought not to be disregarded. It is true that we have been overwhelmed with appeals and that every day brings its new cause and its new demand. Necessarily we must practice discrimination even where all are worthy, but perhaps the discrimination should be in favor of the institutions that have grown up in our midst, that have been tested and proved before our eyes. It would be an ill day for the needy children of San Francisco if the Children's Hospital should fail them. The sum total of its beneficences are incalculable. It ought not to be pinched by a lack of funds that have always been so admirably administered.

Paul Fort, one of the most illustrious of French writers, tells the world by means of a letter to the newspapers that he is starving. He can not publish his writings because the cost of paper is too high. He has applied to the government, but the government has no money to spare. How could it have, after a four years' war? Looking to the other side of the Rhine we are told that Hugo von Hofmannstahl, who wrote the libretti for the Richard Strauss operas, has actually been begging for food. And there must be hundreds of men of letters and artists, not so eminent, whose straits must be even more severe. What can be done? It seems heartless to say that nothing can be done. Moreover, and as a matter of self-interest, it is surely bad business to allow genius to be starved into silence.

For twenty years there has been an increasing use in this country of manila rope for power transmission in mills and factories in place of leather belting. In English factories ropes superseded belting long ago, and their use is nearly universal. In the United States the change that has taken place began with the acquisition of the Philippine Islands, where, as everybody knows, the manila hemp flourishes. The fibre of this hemp varies in length from six to twelve feet, and occasionally attains a length of eighteen feet. It is said to possess greater tensile strength than any other fibre known, exceeding 50,000 pounds per square inch. Rope drives, as transmission ropes are called, possess the advantage of noiselessness, owing to their flexibility and to the existence of an air passage in the grooves between the rope and the sheath.

Major-General McIntyre, chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, in his annual report urges American capital to develop the oil lands of the Philippines, which he says are extensive.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The Price We Pay.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 18, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Referring to your article entitled "The Price We Pay," I am wholly in sympathy with your views and they are absolutely correct, and yet I believe that most people are in the same attitude as I find myself. I have no horror of nor apprehension as to the breakdown of law as evidenced by the Santa Rosa affair. It lies in my mind as a perfectly natural and logical action of a body of law-abiding citizens who desired that the punishment should not fail, and that it be administered in the most efficient and speedy manner. Now I know that that reasoning won't stand critical analysis, and yet it exists. Such punishment always has produced a better condition of things than existed before. I attribute it somewhat to the fact that the crimes themselves were outside the pale of any civilization that we know anything about. To call them "brutal" would be to insult every form of the brute creation. Nor can they be called the acts of degenerates. Degenerates are irresponsible, but these men seem to have had considerable political influence, some of them representing an art which attracts even our Supreme Judges on occasion, and all seem to have a responsibility equal to that of the average citizen.

For a weak and inefficient administration of government nature seems to have provided a proper substitute which works swiftly and ends as quickly as it comes together. Between this and a mob there is no point of resemblance. That it worked smoothly at Santa Rosa is evident, and that it leaves no untoward influence on the public mind is equally evident. That public officials have been stimulated to a more proper appreciation of their functions is also evident.

Yours truly, I. H. MORSE.

Sinn Fein vs. America.

LOS ANGELES, December 11, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In an editorial in the Argonaut of December 4th on the "Sinn Fein versus America" you say: "Nor can we in any way evade the conviction that the church, if it would, might easily mitigate the murderous hostility now being waged in Ireland if only by a stern denunciation of the wanton murder of policemen and of civilians, trapped like rats, unresisting and defenseless."

I take the liberty of enclosing a clipping containing a number of quotations from recent sermons by members of the Irish hierarchy. I believe the denunciations are as stern as even you could wish and I think that, after reading the clippings, you will in fairness refer to the subject again in your editorial columns.

Of course, I am unable to see why you brought the Catholic church into the matter at all. Unfortunately, very unfortunately, when an Irishman becomes a Catholic he does not cease to be an Irishman. If he did the world would be a very much more peaceful place than it is now.

As for Mgr. Lavelle appealing to them to disperse for "the love of Ireland," was he not justified in doing that? To what other sentiment could he have appealed? Are they not Irish first and Americans afterwards? Do they not call themselves "Irish-Americans"? That is, they are Irish and then they are Americans. In the midst of a riot I think the monseigneur showed good judgment.

Will you please return the clipping to me in the enclosed stamped and addressed envelope?

Yours very truly, A. W. REDMAN.

Russia.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 7, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I read some time ago an article in your paper, signed by Sidney Coryn, and which referred to Russia and France. Permit me to take exception to some of this gentleman's assertions. How can he say that Russia had been deliberately out of the counsels of Europe, when on the contrary ever since the days of Napoleon, Russian influence had been very great down to the outbreak of this last war. Generally, however, the influence exerted by her was of a malignant character. The so-called Holy Alliance, conceived by the Emperor Alexander I from ideal motives, very soon degenerated into a conspiracy for the repression of all liberal aspirations among the various European nations. The Tsar Nicholas I had a consort, a sister of the King of Prussia, Frederick William III, and the closest friendship existed between the two courts and states. This went so far that the two armies at one time had joint military maneuvers in the town of Kalisz, and the reactionary party in Prussia, the so-called Junkers, the only party in Prussia which had influence in those days, fawned upon the Tsar in the most servile manner. Austria in 1849 called upon Russia to aid her in the suppression of the Hungarian uprising, which request was responded to with an army of about 200,000 men. A most unfortunate event in the history of Russia was the assassination of the Emperor Alexander II, as after his death it transpired that he had been on the eve of granting a constitution to the Russian Empire. Was Europe in any way responsible for the catastrophe which had been precipitated by Russian fanatics? Then again later on, when France founded an alliance with Russia, the latter state became closely related to general European interests.

Now comes Mr. Coryn as diplomat and strategist and blames Europe, and by implication France, not to have lent a helping hand to put Russia on her legs again. How could France do it when the treachery of her Russian ally almost strangled her, and when these scoundrels who rule Russia at this moment deliberately repudiate the debts contracted by the preceding government? Russia owes an enormous amount to French investors, who are not the big capitalists only, but mainly les petites gens, the small purses, and I ask myself how can a nation be helped by outsiders if they themselves seem to be as limp as a washrag and thus far have not found men able enough to end a régime which eventually must end in disaster?

Yours respectfully, JORIS VAN ANTWERPEN.

The Attack on the Union Club.

W. & J. SLOANE
Fifth Avenue & 47th Street

NEW YORK, December 16, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: My partner, Mr. George D. Cooper, of our house in San Francisco, has sent me a copy of the Argonaut of December 4th, and I am glad to see that you have taken up the cudgels in behalf of Americanism.

I am a member of the Union Club, though I was not present at the time of the attack. I should like to correct, however, your impression that the building was wrecked. The members of the club, aided by the police, defeated the entrance of the mob into the building. They stood as a solid block and kept them back until a large force of police arrived. The building was not damaged inside—only the windows were broken, but the acting chief of police (himself an Irishman) was so fearful of a terrible riot and bloodshed that he begged the governors of the club to haul down the English flag, which the governors peremptorily refused to do, although there was a howling mob of nearly five thousand Irishmen outside. Both Monsignor Lavelle and the acting chief of police appeared together at the club and begged the house committee to take down the flag rather than incite the mob to violence, but as a matter of principle, in defense of Americanism, the club resolutely refused and said they would rather have the building destroyed than allow an Irish mob to dictate what flags they should put out.

We have had no apology from the church, although several of our governing committee had an interview with the archbishop. Not a word was said by him, either in public or privately, deprecating the attack on the club, nor was one word said by him advising his parishioners to observe law and order.

The Allied flags have always been hung from the club house on holidays and any important public celebration. The members of the club were not aware that there was to be any procession, nor were they aware of the ceremony that was to take place in memory of the suicide MacSwiney.

I thought that the details of this attack might interest you, and therefore I have taken this liberty.

Yours very truly, HENRY T. SLOANE.

A Compliment.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 20, 1920.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Permit me to express my own and the appreciation of various friends for the splendid, courageous editorials you write each week. It is a refreshing change from the nauseating drivel of the yellow and reactionary morning press which has inflicted itself upon this long-suffering city. Your healthy, outspoken criticism of the rottenness and corruption of our municipal government departments will bear fruit eventually, and your fearless exposé of the dangerous Sinn Fein element and their workings to embroil this country in their nefarious and self-seeking schemes will find an echo in the minds of all right-thinking people. More power to your trenchant pen and may your good work long continue.

THE INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COURT.

(By Joe G. Sweet of the San Francisco Bar.)

ON January 5, 1920, the legislature of the State of Kansas, called into session as a result of the great coal strike, met to hear the message of Governor Henry Allen. In the course of the message the governor said:

As we review the growing quarrel between capital and labor we are all impressed with the fact that we have made absolutely no progress toward the provision of a just and orderly basis of solution. Every settlement of every controversy has been upon a temporary basis, and the sole concern in every temporary adjustment has to do with the advantages of capital or labor. Into few controversies does there ever come a consideration of the rights of the public. The largest party at interest scarcely receives a hearing. I believe the time has come, in the increasing industrial life of the country, when a tribunal should be established which shall have the power to take under its jurisdiction the offenses against society in the name of industrial warfare, a tribunal which shall have the authority to meet industrial discontent, before it crystallizes, by a careful oversight and regulation of the conditions of labor before any injustices are allowed to fester and breed class hatred and bitter antagonisms.

There is no reason why government should not have the same power to protect society against the ruthless offenses of industrial strife as it has always had to protect it against crime. I have called the legislature into extraordinary session in the hope that we may create a "Court of Industrial Relations" which shall provide a substitute for strikes and lockouts and protect the public against the abuses which now come upon it during the course of industrial controversies.

As a result of that message the legislature passed a bill effective January 24, 1920, creating the Court of Industrial Relations.

No act of a state legislature within the past twenty years has attracted so much attention, and yet its provisions and purposes are but dimly understood. The average employer perhaps looks upon it as a weapon to be used in repelling the attacks of labor. The rank and file of labor, misinformed by some of their leaders, may consider it as a means for the enslavement of labor by denying men the right to leave their employment. The general public probably looks upon it as an instrument that is to be used in time of stress and then laid aside.

As a matter of fact it is none of these things. Functioning continuously, with powers wide in their scope, combining the powers of a public utilities commission with those of a minimum wage board and having many new and additional powers, it is one of the strongest instruments ever created to govern or guide the economic forces of a state.

The Court of Industrial Relations is composed of three members appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a three-year term. One goes out of office each year. The salary is $5,000 per annum and the senior in point of service presides.

The act which created this court abolished the public utilities commission of the state and conferred its jurisdiction upon the court. The fixing of rates for service and the general powers of regulation and supervision of public utilities vested in such commissions are exercised by this court. In addition certain other businesses, not under the jurisdiction of the former public utilities commission, have been placed under the supervision of the Court of Industrial Relations.

The manufacture and preparation of food products for humans, the manufacture of wearing apparel, the mining and production of fuels and the transporting of food, clothing, and fuels are declared to be businesses "affected with public interest" and therefore subject to supervision by the state for the purpose of preserving the public peace, protecting the public health, preventing industrial strife, disorder, and waste, and securing the regular and orderly conduct of businesses directly affecting the living conditions of the people of the state and the general welfare.

It is declared to be necessary that the industries and utilities mentioned be operated with reasonable continuity and efficiency. No person, firm, corporation, or association of persons is allowed wilfully to hinder, delay, limit, or suspend such continuous and efficient operation for the purpose of evading the act. No person, firm, or corporation engaged in any of the enumerated industries, or operating one of the utilities, is allowed wilfully to limit or cease operation for the purpose of limiting production or transportation or to affect prices, for the purpose of avoiding any provisions of the act. In proper cases the court may make its order permitting such limitation or cessation of operation.

Whenever a controversy arises between employers and workers in any of the enumerated industries or utilities and it appears to the Court of Industrial Relations that the controversy may endanger the continuity or efficiency of the businesses or utilities, or that it may affect the production or transportation of the necessities of life affected or produced by the industries, or produce industrial strife, disorder, or waste, or endanger the orderly operation of the industries and utilities, then the court, upon its own initiative, may summon before it all necessary parties and proceed to investigate the controversy.

During the pendency of the investigations the court may make such temporary orders as may be necessary to preserve the public peace, to protect property and the public interests, and to preserve the status of the parties.

If upon the complaint of either party to an industrial controversy, or upon the complaint of ten taxpayers of the community in which the industry affected is located, or of the attorney-general of the state, it shall be made to appear that there is a controversy threatening the operation of the industries or utilities and that the parties are unable to agree, it becomes the duty of the court to investigate and determine the controversy.

After hearing, it must make its findings and orders. It may order such changes as it finds necessary to be made in the working and living conditions in the industry, the hours of labor, and in the rules and practices of the industry. It may also establish a reasonable minimum wage. The order is served upon the parties and remains in effect for a reasonable time to be fixed by the court or until changed by the parties with the consent of the court.

The court is without power to compel obedience to its process or to enforce its decrees. They are enforced by the regular courts of the state upon the application of the Court of Industrial Relations. Its proceedings are subject to review by the Supreme Court new evidence may in proper cases be offered.

The law recognizes the right of the workers to bargain collectively and to incorporate. The right of the officers or agents of a union to represent the union is expressly recognized, but the appointment must be in writing and must be a permanent record of the union.

The right of the individual worker to quit his employment is freely recognized. But it is made unlawful for any person or employee to conspire with other persons to quit their employment or to induce other persons to quit their employment for the purpose of hindering, delaying, interfering with, or suspending the operation of any of the industries in question. It is likewise made unlawful to picket or intimidate by threats, abuse, or other means any person or persons to induce such persons to quit their employment or for the purpose of deterring them from accepting employment or remaining in the employ of the industries.

In case of the suspension, limitation, or cessation of the operation of any of the enumerated industries or utilities the Court of Industrial Relations may take proceedings in a court of law to take over, direct, and operate the business, but in such a case a fair return must be made to the owners and a fair wage paid to the workers.

Persons wilfully violating the act or an order of the court are, upon conviction, liable to a fine not to exceed one thousand dollars, or a term of imprisonment in the county jail for a period not to exceed one year, or to both fine and imprisonment.

Officers of corporations, employers, and officers of labor unions using their positions as officers or employers to influence or compel other persons to violate the act or the orders of the Court of Industrial Relations shall upon conviction in a court of competent jurisdiction be liable to a fine not to exceed five thousand dollars and to imprisonment at hard labor for a term not to exceed two years, or to both fine and imprisonment.

This, in brief, is the act which the legislature of the State of Kansas passed in the hope that it would prevent the recurrence of such disastrous labor wars as the great coal strike of 1919. Time alone can tell how successfully the new court will cope with difficulties. There is great interest and considerable opposition throughout the nation. The strongest opposition comes from the leaders of labor, and yet in its decisions it has recognized the right of the laborer to all of those things for which he claims to be contending. It has merely denied him the right to disregard the rights of others in securing his own. Surely no laborer can take exception to the words of this court when in the course of its opinion granting an increase in wages to the employees of the Joplin and Pittsburg Railway Company it said:

This court is very desirous to do nothing in this case which will unduly burden the respondent (railway company). However, it must be admitted that wages to labor should be considered before dividends to the investor, and that a business which is unable to pay a fair rate of wages will eventually have to liquidate.

And again, speaking of faithful and skilled workers:

Such persons, in all fairness, are entitled to a wage which will enable them to procure for themselves and their families all the necessities and a reasonable share of the comforts of life. They are entitled to a wage which will enable them by industry and economy, not only to supply themselves with opportunities for intellectual advancement and reasonable recreation, but also to enable the parents working together to furnish to the children ample opportunities for intellectual and moral advancement, for education, and for an equal opportunity in the race of life. A fair wage will also allow the frugal man to provide reasonably for sickness and old age.

THE LETTER.

(By Pierre Soulaïne. Translated from L'Echo de Paris for the Living Age.)

Mme. de la Charmoise was sitting in the little salon which she had chosen to house her favorite bric-à-brac. Reclining on a couch in somewhat of a Mme. Récamier pose, she meditated.

Her thoughts were not random ones, but precise. She was expecting a visit from Jacques Legallec, the brilliant cotillion leader, who would ask her to marry him. Odette de la Charmoise, who wanted to answer yes, was telling herself that it would be safer to say no.

She had been two years a widow. Her husband, the witty and erudite Paul de la Charmoise, had been her elder by many years. So surely had she been shielded from all unpleasant contacts by her husband's devoted and tender care that Odette feared lest she suffer from the brutal egoism visible beneath the too perfect manners of Jacques Legallec. But so lonely was she that the idea of suffering caused her no fear.

A knock at the door was heard, and a sulky maid entered with a letter. Odette was about to lay the envelope casually aside, when a glance at the address caused her to rise with a start. She had recognized her husband's hand.

For a minute or two she hesitated. Then she stole another glance at the letter. No, she had not been mistaken. The handwriting on the envelope was undoubtedly that of her dead husband; she recognized the individual twists and turns. An examination of the stamp showed that the missive had been mailed the night before. When her tears permitted, Odette broke the seal and read:

MY LOVED ONE: Death has not stopped me from thinking of you. From afar I watch over your happiness. I know that you are to be asked in marriage. I am far from being so selfish as to expect you to spend your youth in a long widowhood, but you must have my consent to a new alliance. My love for you has been a great love, yet should you find a fiancé capable of loving you as I have, I shall consent to your remarriage with good grace. But before I shall bless such a union as you intend, I must beg you to see my old counsel, M. Laurent, in his office at the Rue Arsène-Houssaye. He is one of my best and most respected friends, and I have asked him to talk over with your future husband those interests of yours which I want above all to safeguard. You see that I am not asking very much. Only do as I ask you, and my manes, to use the ancient phrase, shall find peace. I know that you will not refuse them this little satisfaction.

Through all eternity I love you. PAUL.

Odette was not superstitious. She was no believer in miracles. And she took the reasonable ground that her husband must have given this letter to a friend, probably to this very lawyer whom he had mentioned. Reassured, she went to her room to soothe away the traces of her tears.

An hour later Jacques Legallec arrived. The best of Parisian monacles rode in his eye, and an expensive English suit fitted snugly about his lean shoulders. Instead of finding the nervous, apprehensive, and grateful woman whom he had counted on discovering, he found Odette calm and entirely mistress of herself.

Legallec had prepared a pretty scene of affectionate emotion. He had calculated the minute even at which he should sweep his conquest into his arms. But Odette's attitude spoiled the little drama, and he found himself obliged to change his method. Possessed of tact and resolution, he at length managed an avowal.

"My friend," replied Mme. de la Charmoise, "I admit that I am not surprised at your proposal. Since I evidently awaited something of this kind, and have received you, you doubtless feel that your avowal is not unpleasing to me?"

Legallec wished to rise from his chair, but Mme. de la Charmoise, with a courtly gesture, invited him to remain seated.

"But there are 'business matters' connected with every marriage, affairs which are quite odious to me. I want to feel absolutely certain that all matters of this kind have been talked over before we go on further to discuss the question of marriage. Will you please go tomorrow to my counsel, M. Laurent, 124 Rue Arsène-Houssaye, and talk matters over with him? I authorize you to make clear to him a possibility of my consent. And on the day after tomorrow come again to see me."

Legallec bowed, signified his approval of the visit, and withdrew visibly disconcerted. The noise of the closing door shook Odette to the heart. What would the future bring forth? Her instinct told her that Legallec would not return. Two days passed without a visitor, and on the third day a letter arrived saying that "unavoidable circumstances" required M. Legallec's presence in the provinces. Mme. de la Charmoise sought out her husband's attorney.

"Yes, madame," said he, "it was indeed I who sent the letter. Your husband confided them to my care."

"There are others?"

"His great soul envisaged all the dangers of your solitude. Should life place you in still other uncertain situations, it would be my duty to send you other letters. Well, I received M. Legallec, and divined at once that he would fall into the trap which it was my duty to lay for him."

"You laid a trap for Monsieur Legallec?"

"A very little one. I simply told him that you had been for some time in the gravest financial difficulties."

A cry of pain escaped Mme. de la Charmoise.

"And the retreat which he beat at once leaves no doubt about the genuineness of his intentions."

A little nervous, Odette rose from her chair.

"I must thank you, monsieur."

At the door, however, she paused, and asked uneasily:

"There are many more letters?"

"Yes, madame, many. My dear friend, inspired by the love he bore you, foresaw everything probable and improbable. His soul guards your happiness."

O listen, listen, ladies gay!

No haughty feat of arms I tell;
Soft is the note, and sad the lay,
That mourns the lovely Rosabelle.

—Moor, moor the barge, ye gallant crew!
And gentle lady, deign to stay!
Rest thee in Castle Ravensheuch,
Nor tempt the stormy firth today.

"The blackening wave is edged with white;
To inch and rock the sea-mews fly;
The fishers have heard the Water-Sprite,
Whose screams forebode that wreck is nigh.

"Last night the gifted Seer did view
A wet shroud swathed round ladye gay;
Then stay thee, Fair, in Ravensheuch:
Why cross the gloomy firth today?"

"Tis not because Lord Lindsay's heir
Tonight at Roslin leads the ball,
But that my ladye-mother there
Sits lonely in her castle-hall.

"Tis not because the ring they ride,
And Lindsay at the ring rides well,
But that my sire the wine will chide,
If 'tis not fill'd by Rosabelle."

O'er Roslin all that dreary night,
A wondrous blaze was seen to gleam;
'Twas broader than the watch-fire's light,
And redder than the bright moonbeam.

It glared on Roslin's castled rock,
It ruddled all the copse-wood glen;
'Twas seen from Dryden's groves of oak,
And seen from cavern'd Hawthornden.

Seem'd all on fire that chapel proud
Where Roslin's chiefs unc coffin'd lie.
Each Baron, for a sable shroud,
Sheathed in his iron panoply.

Seem'd all on fire within, around,
Deep sacristy and altar's pale;
Shone every pillar foliage-bound,
And glimmer'd all the dead men's mail.

Blazed battlement and pinnet high,
Blazed every rose-carved buttress fair—
So still they blaze, when fate is nigh
The lordly line of high St. Clair.

There are twenty of Roslin's barons bold
Lie buried within that proud chapel;
Each one the holy vault doth hold—
But the sea holds lovely Rosabelle!

And each St. Clair was buried there,
With candle, with book, and with kneel;
But the sea-caves rung, and the wild winds sung,
The dirge of lovely Rosabelle. —Walter Scott.

Although the love of Dante for Beatrice often is quoted as a type of earthly attachment, both fine and rare, the facts are that both Dante and Beatrice married others, Dante having four children by his wife. Beatrice died when she was twenty-four. In all the poet saw her but three or four times in his life, the first time when she was a child of eight. He never wooed her or dreamed of marrying her. She was to him merely a symbol for everything that was good and beautiful, and this symbolizing began when the two were children and the grave youth was taken to her father's house by his own parents on a visit. That she cared anything for him beyond a careless friendship or the careless regard one has for a seldom-met acquaintance is doubtful. Her full name was Beatrice Portinari, and she died in 1290, Dante taking a wife two years later. In speaking of her Dante said: "I saw her at about the end of my ninth year. Her dress on that day was of a most noble color, a subdued and goodly crimson, girdled and adorned in such sort as best suited with her tender age. At that moment I saw most truly that the spirit of life which hath its dwelling in the secretest chamber of the heart began to tremble so violently that the least pulses of my body began to shake therewith."

The Colonial Dames of America has the distinction of being the oldest patriotic society for women in the United States.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

One of the best-known women writers of South America is Zoila Aurora Caceras, the daughter of the President of Peru.

It is reported by the London Times that Bernard Shaw and Sir James Barrie are at work upon scenarios for the motion pictures.

Harriet Chalmers Adams, F. R. G. S., has achieved the distinction of being called America's foremost woman explorer. She spent many years in this country, studying every important Indian tribe from Canada to Cape Horn. Then she visited the Orient to trace the coming of the ancient tribes to this land.

The musical world was startled recently by the statement of New York experts, who made the tests, that Robert Murray, twelve-year-old Tacoma boy, is singing higher notes than reached by the most famous opera singers. The lad is being trained in New York for appearances throughout the country.

Horatio Blanco Fombona, the Venezuelan poet and newspaper man, has started a hunger strike in Santo Domingo, where he is being held as a prisoner by the American military authorities. According to dispatches from Havana, Fombona's refusal of food is said to be in protest, not only against his detention, but also against the quality of food provided him. This ration is alleged to consist of beans and potatoes.

Mrs. Florence Wilson of 8061 Frankford Avenue, Philadelphia, has been appointed librarian of the league of nations. She has been doing preliminary organization work for the league in London for several months. She will have charge of gathering an immense library to embrace research in every nation of the earth. She expects to use the American system of library cataloging and classifying to a great extent.

Miss Martha Kemble of 745 Walnut Street, Camden, New Jersey, won the election for justice of the peace over the Democratic nominee, a man. She polled 2112 votes, leading the Republican ticket in her district, where Harding received 1968. She is a graduate of Camden High School and a telephone operator in the First National Bank. She does not expect to give up her present position. She is said to be New Jersey's first woman judge. She has been doing volunteer work for her party for several years and has always been keenly interested in politics. Miss Kemble lives with her widowed mother and two brothers.

One of America's most prolific and successful writers is Mary Roberts Rinehart, and while she never directed a mule car in Chicago, the writing of lurid detective stories, romantic novels, humorous short stories, plays, and motion-picture scenarios was about the last thing registered in the hope chest of Mary Roberts when she was graduated from a Pittsburgh high school in 1894. Nor did her aspirations lead her to a quest for higher knowledge in the Vassars, the Wellesleys, the Bryn Mawrs, and a host of other standard and fashionable schools. None of these grand and idealistic aims had a place in the early speculations of the young woman from Pittsburgh. Rather, she looked with hopeful eyes on the great humanitarian side of life and decided to be a trained nurse that she might devote a measure of her years, at least, to the care of the sick and the wounded.

Sir Rabindranath Tagore is again in this country after an absence of four years. His poems and plays embodying the Indian philosophy and mythology have been growing more and more generally familiar throughout the world, and now we are to have an opportunity to see the dramatic presentation of several of his plays on the New York stage. It is through the influence and interest of William Faversham largely that this result has been brought about. Sir Rabindranath saw Faversham in "The Prince and the Pauper" and was struck with the spiritual likeness between the inner significance of this work of Mark Twain and some native East Indian plays. A meeting took place in the actor's dressing-room after the play, and it developed that Faversham, who spent a considerable part of his boyhood in India, is well versed in the lore and philosophy of that country.

Turkey's 146-year-old-man, Zora Mehmed, reputed to be the oldest man in the world, has been ill for some time with indigestion. This was the first time Zora had ever been ill. He complained that it was because of his set of false teeth. Zora has always been a hamal, that is, a carrier of heavy weights, ranging from 200 to 1000 pounds. When he was forty-five years of age, during the Napoleonic wars, he tried to lift, on a bet, 500 pounds with his teeth and ruined them. He went until about 1850 without any teeth, and then he obtained a set which wore out about twenty years ago. He got another set. He declared these teeth gave him indigestion, which finally landed him in the hospital. Until his present illness, Zora was employed, as a hamal, at the Turkish naval base. He was born at Bitlis, in Turkish Armenia, in the year 1774, just before the American revolution, but does not remember that event. Zora has a son, aged ninety, and a young daughter, aged fifty. His heart and eyes are still good and he looks like a man of seventy. He offered his passport as proof of his age, as well as the birth records in the mosque at Bitlis.

A VOLUME OF ESSAYS.

Winifred Kirkland Writes Delightfully About Things in General.

It has been said that the art of the essay writer is dead. But then letter-writing also is said to be a lost art, and it is true neither of the one nor of the other. It may be that a utilitarian age demands that most of its literature be in the form of facts, tabulated if possible. It may be that we are usually too busy to write real letters. None the less there are still good essayists and good letter-writers, and among the former may be counted Winifred Kirkland, whose little volume, "The View Vertical," has just seen the light of day.

Winifred Kirkland writes about all sorts of things, but she usually chooses a commonplace and then proceeds to show that it is not a commonplace. Along that road lies all art. What, for example, can be more essentially commonplace than making a scene? Most of us can do it with more or less success. Most of us do it, but we regard it as a vice—when done by others. But the author shows it to be a virtue. She says she can make a scene anywhere and upon any occasion. She can veritably be like a terrier among tabby cats. She can descend upon the most placid of breakfast-tables and leave it a perfect welter of emotions. In-agine, she seems to say, what a reformatory power lies herein:

Let no one imagine that I am so base as to employ my talents solely for my own advantage. Scene-making has altruistic possibilities. I frequently use it as a means of restraint upon evil tendencies in others. I have a brother prone to cigarettes; presto, the merest whiff of tobacco throws me into spasms! He is a dear, domestic chap, worth making a bit of an effort for; I congratulate myself that I have saved him health and happiness by making home too hot to hold his cigarettes. Himself untainted by the odious perfume, he always finds me the coziest of household accessories.

Then there is my pale friend possessed of an unconquerable affection for red. It is a color that in a wink's time wipes off all her loveliness, leaving only ashen pallor in its place. Now does this friend appear before me with but a vestige of the obnoxious color attached to her person—the music of those of Bashan is as nothing compared with my bellowing. She is the mildest of mortals, and, as a consequence of my aversion, she wears in my presence those blues that do so easily bedeck her. Thus do I preserve her intact from the evil results of her own ill-taste. In blue she finds me ever the most genial and gentle of comrades.

Then again, consider the case of stoutness. Over how many feminine lives has not the terror of adiposity cast its shadow? But to be fat is to be fashionable. A dress sale announces "Stylish Stouts," and at once the fat woman acquires a new dignity. She now has dresses to reveal, not to conceal, her shapeliness. But how is it that the fat man has so far escaped the contumely awarded to the fat woman?

It is a curious fact that in neither East nor West has the stylishness of stouts been extended to the male sex. The norm for man is to be long and limber. As the hero of romance, a man may be hawny; but except in farce, he may not yet be fat. In America this ideal of masculine slimmness is explained by our fondness for thinking of our men as lean wrestlers with frontier conditions, for the fact of a frontier is still a pleasant figment of our fancy. As a matter of brutal truth, both our men and our women have swelled perceptibly during a long period of plenty and of ease. Not all our Hooverizing has notably reduced the tendency of both sexes toward an opulent maturity. The pitiful point is that our men are not yet allowed by fashion to grow fat with dignity. Of course, it has never been so hard for a man to be voluminous as for a woman, because he thinks only of how uncomfortable he feels, and not, concomitantly, of how ungainly he looks. And yet the fat man has had pain enough in being the butt of the papers and of his pals; and from this anguish he can not be relieved until fashion lifts its ban from his person as it has lifted it from that of the lady. No shop is as yet exhibiting styles for the stout man. He is still forced to squeeze himself into clothes designed for the stripling.

Incidentally the author has a tilt at science. It threatens to invade our privacies. Hitherto we have been able to shut ourselves up, each in a sort of sturdy tower, and to allow others to see only as much of us as we may wish. But now comes telepathy. Our minds are no longer our own. We must share our thoughts with all and sundry. The old secret places are denied to us:

Although telepathy has not yet come into popular social usage, we occasionally meet people not ashamed to exhibit it as an accomplishment. Such people are most discouraging to conversation. When a person knows what we are going to say before we say it, the effort of expressions seems futile; the racy epithet, the felicitous phrase go unspoken. There would presently be no bons-mots to be quoted; life would not be enlivened by the twinkling passage of repartee, that light rebound of thought and word, striking against surfaces that can not pierce. When there are no walls for talk to knock against, and no gates to be opened or shut to other people's penetration, the art of conversation will die, and social intercourse be reduced to fatuous smirking at each other's faces—or perhaps to a fierce clawing of them, when the thoughts of all hearts shall be revealed.

The universal employment of telepathic communication would do away with another prerogative of society, the right to gossip. In our present imperfect means of knowledge, everybody presents a different aspect to everybody else. To gossip is to bring forward for discussion all the data each observer has gathered; it is a comparison of various angles of misunderstanding tending to diffuse unenlightenment and thus to protect the person under examination from an intrusively accurate analysis. Now, if his soul were presented in the same crystalline fidelity to each of us, he himself would neither enjoy privacy of spirit, nor we our game of guessing.

We do not want the rather dreadful knowledge that telepathy offers to us. We do not want to understand each other too much. We love the uncertainties that give a spice to life. We like to guess. But now it seems that souls are to be read as easily as spelling books, and science has the effrontery to describe this as the coming of a millennium:

I have shown how a system of telepathic communication would disrupt our social life and destroy the literature constructed to reflect that life. There are, however, two darker and deeper dangers incident to letting everybody use the aerial apparatus. If the introduction of telepathy would undermine social intercourse, it would absolutely annul solitude. The wings of the dove could never outdistance the impudent wings of the wireless. Anybody who wished could send his thoughts forth to investigate anybody else's nest in the wilderness. Privacy would rapidly become a prehistoric privilege. Solitude is the chief support of the affections; it would be impossible to love your fellow-man if you knew you could never get away from him.

Last and most painful peril of all: it is not only my own and my neighbor's retirement that I would preserve impenetrable to mutual invasion; but there are other regions I do not wish to enter with any clear certainty, the skyward changes of my own high tower of secrecy, where I sometimes entertain a mysterious visitor. If telepathy taught me the language of the spirit, I might inadvertently learn to understand my own. Let not science be so sacrilegious. When I loaf and invite my own soul, I want the guest to come to me without any telepathic eavesdropping on the part of other people, and without any profaning analysis on my own part. Let no telepathy interrupt my communing with that august presence, my own soul.

Having rehabilitated the fat woman and the maker of scenes, the author advances fearlessly to a defense of worry. She seems to think that the optimist is a nuisance, as of course he is. Moreover, he is unethical. How can we concern ourselves over the well-being of another unless we have practiced, so to speak, by worrying about ourselves? When we want sympathy we turn always to the best worrier:

Another argument for worry is the kind of hooks that tell you not to. Apart from their character, their very popularity furnishes cause for profound regret that people desire to buy even joy at wholesale, that they may demand even cheerfulness in the terrible tins of the ready-made. Such cheerfulness is sadly attenuated by the absence of good, meaty truth. The only cheer that contains nutriment is the kind that you raise in your own garden and put up with your own hands. A work that can announce itself to the dry-goods counter as "The Happy Book" is a book promptly shunned by readers who read. Such a book is as true to life as a child's book of sketches—shapes whose conventional outlines make them pass for men and women and wheelbarrows, daubed in colors of unshaded radiance.

Let us then worry, not from temperament, but from conviction. Pessimism points out the shadows and sharpens the sense of values of which art consists. If you can visualize success you must first have visualized failure. The artist who does not worry had best get to work and do so:

The moral advantages of fever and fret are even greater than the mental. Our ancestors recognized this fact and provided for it, but our pusillanimous cheerfulness recoils before their robust recognition of muscle. Knowing the placidity resultant from being unable to stand up and fight a good husky Fear on his own ground, they created the Fear and the ground, calling the one the Devil and the other Hell. There used to be a most stimulating little signboard at the entrance of hell, "Who enters here leaves hope behind," but many moderns make the depressing amendment, "There isn't any such 'here' to enter." In like manner, unconsciously, we pine for the good old devil of our forefathers. He used to be always hanging around handy for you to test your heroism upon him. He was worry incarnate, providing the most muscular exercise for anybody who wanted to wrestle. The anti-worry campaign denies the usefulness of bugaboos, whereas a really good bugaboo is a liberal education. Constant companionship with him is a training in imagination, in sympathy, in self-dependence, and, last—an argument which knocks out from under him the strongest support of the optimist—in the joy of life.

Can the non-worrier ever know the hero thrill of the hair-breadth rescues we did not make when the boat did not go down? Can he experience the pride of economy we did not practice when the bank did not fail? Has he ever tasted the quiescence of relief when the best-loved one did not die of the pneumonia she did not have? How can the poor optimist ever discover that one actually runs faster toward one's desire when the dogs of worry are nipping at one's heels? Never the goal so alluring, never the pace so fleet, never the tingle of achievement so keen, as when one perceives the prize threatened. What does he know about success, the man who has never feared that he might fail? What does he know about happiness, anyway, the man who believes in being happy all the time? The truth is that worry puts a gilt edge of joy on everything.

Winifred Kirkland hates calories. So do all right-thinking people. The word should be expunged from our magazines instead of being the only word that one is quite sure to find there. It stands as a spectre behind all social relations. It paralyzes art, society, friendship, and all the kindly human relations:

To science all things are possible, and a generation exhaustively informed about calories may in the future produce as notable poets as those of the past, but at present evidence is against this result. Calculating each mouthful and studying the course and conduct in digestion is too engrossing to allow the free flights of genius. "Look into thy heart and write" is sound advice, but "look into thy stomach and write" is singularly sterile in literary output.

The calorie is influencing our social relations, infecting with its grossly material methods the essentially spiritual intercourse between friends. It is difficult to be at ease as a guest when the table is too conscious of its calories. One feels a horrible besitation in measuring one's appetite to a nicety before one helps one's self from a dish. When the visitor and the hostess are both familiar with those long placards of listed per cents by which a bean is proved bigger than a heefsteak, one is constrained in consuming either of these delicacies. When the weekly budget is reckoned in calories, any indulgence at a friend's table, once a compliment to the cuisine, may nowadays be an unkind upsetting of a much-meditated ration. Matters are not improved when one becomes entertainer instead of entertained. The calorie is subtle symbol of much disintegration of courteous impulses. The spontaneity of an invitation is threatened when hospitality halts before the possible depredation and devastation from a guest's appetite.

The author discusses in a ruminative way the causes that lead editors to reject manuscripts. She finds that there are fashions in such matters, as in most others. A few years ago editors politely informed contributors that their manuscripts did not "quite compel acceptance":

A few years later the phrase polite for "no admittance" changed. The buffet became more robust and ringing. Editors at this period asked for "a little more ginger." Six or seven years ago all editors were crying for "ginger." I could not give it to them, but so many other people could and did, that presently they had enough ginger and were passing on to demand stronger condiment; they no longer wanted ginger, but "a little more pep, please." Editors at this stage were becoming less gentle in language as well as in desires. At first I merely could not "quite compel acceptance," but later rebuff was administered in figurative speech that became constantly more arresting. "Ginger" and "pep" were mild and gastronomic in suggestion, but from the "pep" period on, editorial imagery has been becoming more and more vigorous.

For a long time "punch" dominated the vocabulary and intentions of all periodicals. It made no difference what other accomplishments a manuscript might possess: if it could not "punch," it might as well stay at home. A writer had no choice but to drop contemplation, remove his coat, hand his spectacles to his wife, adopt the language of the prize-ring and "punch" his reader—an audacious enterprise and productive of more unanimity in rejection than any other course I have pursued.

My literary career under enforced editorial guidance has steadily advanced from suavity to violence. At first I tried merely to "compel attention"; next I obediently served "ginger" and "pep"; after that, weakly and mildly, I endeavored to "punch"; but there are progressive ordeals yet before me. To "punch," in the prize-fight, there is allowed a degree of decorum; there are still rules for the game in "punching," but I discover that even "punch" is obsolescent. This morning an editor returns my offerings with the comment, "Excellent of their kind, but I prefer stories with more 'kick'!" Can I, must I, "kick"?

According to the cumulative demand of editors for ferocity, after "kick," what? Next week I shall be requested to "stab"? To make a siletto of the innocent pen whose first efforts were taught manners by Sir Roger de Coverly? I wonder how Addison and Irving would have responded if they had been asked to "kick." My pained imagination looks forward into the years of bread-winning still before me, to read in fancy the reasons for future rejection, as editors become more frenzied and figurative. Will it be:

"We are under orders to accept no freight at this dépôt except high explosives"; or, "No magazine can keep on the market today that is not prepared to blow the reader's brains out."

But are there no readers who like the gentle method in literature? Do we all want to be punched and kicked? Do we all crave for "pep"? If not, it is time for us to speak out.

How are stories constructed? The uninitiated have often wished to know, and now we are told by Winifred Kirkland. She tells us how the characters are assembled and the trouble they give. They are restive and will not stand still. They are taciturn and refuse to talk. And when they once begin to act their part they will not stop. Surely a most unruly company:

Somehow at last by dint of infinite patience I persuade them all to go through their proper incidents in their proper order. The next task is to make them pause in their poses long enough for me to catch up my pen and sketch them in action.

Puffing, panting, pleading, somehow or other I get them all down in black and white at last, and then, seeing that I have finished, they all come tiptoeing up to look over my shoulder at what I have written. I turn up my collar against the storm of abuse.

"Is that leering old reprobate meant for me?" inquires the most delightful grandfather I ever met in imagination.

The heroine's cheeks are hot. "I never flirted so outrageously as that with any one in my life," she cries, "not even with—!" Here she glances at the hero.

"She didn't, and you had no business to say so!" he takes up the cudgels. "But, pray, what is this curious fringe I observe ornamenting my vocabulary? College slang! I assure you that it never grew in any college for gentlemen. It sounds to me like an opium den, and I should like to inquire, sir, where you learned it!"

"Where in the world are my eyebrows?" wails the second lady.

Unable to control myself longer, I jump from my chair and turn upon them. "See here, if you think making a story is so much easier than being one, just take my desk and chair and pen and try it!"

One of the greatest difficulties of the story-teller is in the drawing of faces. One is apt so to accentuate a single feature as to produce a caricature. The experienced writer knows how to combine something with the face, such as carriage or gesture, to give truth to a personality. And sometimes it is other aspects of the body that are used to impress the imagination of the reader:

One recalls various instances when other aspects of the body impress both author and reader as more pregnant with revelation than physiognomy. It was not Trix Esmond's head, but her feet, that made havoc with Henry Esmond's heart, feet that we can see twinkling down the polished stair, in their scarlet stockings and white shoes, scarlet stockings with silver clocks. Feet, a wee white pair, a baby's, bare and buoyant, remembered from a magazine poem, dance in my fancy by means of the magic phrase, "unpityingly sweet." One recalls many feet in fiction, feet brutal or groping or tripping, but always feet informed by spirit, and from many a book one recalls hands equally fraught with meaning. Which to Browning connoted more of her character, as he gazed at his wife in the fire-glow, "that great brow," or the "Spirit's small hand propping it"? Which holds us more, the Ancient Mariner's "glittering eye," or his "skinny hand"? Could any terms express better the ethereal pathos of Isult of Brittany, her selfless tending of a stranger knight, fever-tossed, and her yearning widowhood bereft even of memories, than her epithet, "Isult of the snow-white hands"?

Perhaps it should not be said that Winifred Kirkland is the best of our essayists, seeing that there are so many kinds of essays. But it may be said with confidence that she is the best in her own special field.

Total gold reserves of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco increased $24,146,000 and total reserves $24,460,000 during the week ending December 17th, according to the statement issued Saturday. Total gold was $12,993,000 higher. The growth of the three items was due mainly to a jump in gold and gold certificates amounting to more than $23,000,000, offset in the case of total gold by a drop of more than $9,000,000 in the gold settlement fund and accentuated in the other two cases by a rise of nearly $12,000,000 in gold with the Federal Reserve Agent.

Total bills on hand decreased $17,661,000 and total earning assets $18,082,000, all classes of bills showing a falling off. Total resources or liabilities were $15,050,000 higher.

The world war inflicted on this country a funded debt of about $20,000,000,000 and vastly increased current expenditures for governmental purposes. To pay interest on the Federal obligations and to meet running expenses the government needs at present a yearly revenue estimated by some as high as $5,000,000,000. This must all be raised by taxation, and mainly by means of taxes on income and so-called excess profits. When business was booming during the war enormous and increasing sums were subject to levy, and thus, with the bond sales, abundant funds were obtained to finance our militant operations. But earnings and profits no longer reach the lofty marks of the war period. Deflation and readjustment are supplanting inflation and profiteering in commodities and wages. The result is that the amounts of money taxable annually are so seriously decreasing that the government is menaced with a large decline in income. Drastic economy may soon be imperative, and even with that it may be necessary to devise additional, or entirely new, sources of revenue.

The impending failure of the excess profits tax is the outstanding defect of our present scheme of Federal taxation. As a revenue producer this tax has plainly outlived its usefulness. Designed for an emergency which has passed, it has no sound reason for existence in this time of peace. It is defeating the very object aimed at in its creation, for it acts as a powerful deterrent to that enterprise which lays solid foundations for taxation. Practically it confiscates much of the earnings and savings that would naturally be devoted to extensions of plants and increase of production. By taking so much toll the government discourages the promoters of industry. The more they make, the greater the voracity of the government. The working capital of the industries is going into the public till, to be paid out unproductively, when it should be employed to develop the resources and add to the wealth of the country. Consequent loss to the government is unavoidable, for it is killing the goose that lays the golden eggs. The excess profits tax, too, has been one of the chief causes of artificial high prices, for it has been passed on from producer to middleman, to retailer, to consumer. Its abolition would be beneficial both to producer and consumer.

The effect of this tax on the securities market is evident. It is depriving corporations of money that would otherwise enlarge assets and increase the book values of the various issues. Should it be done away with, at least one of the millstones hanging around the neck of the market would be removed. Its repeal would not of itself create a boom, but it would help in the direction of stabilizing market values.

Revision of our taxation system is, therefore, one of the chief requirements of the readjustment process now at work in all lines of business. Lands where taxation is inequitable or excessive do not prosper; and the United States can not evade the working of the economic law. There is a growing demand all over the country that the excess profits tax be repealed. It will be one of the most important duties of Congress to replace it with a more equitable and less destructive tax, one which shall at the same time bring in sufficient revenue.—Leslie's Weekly.

The price situation—with retail prices slow to follow wholesale prices downward—is likened by a writer on the New York Evening Post's financial page to a dramatic performance in which a leading character refuses to respond to the callboy. "The retailer declines to take the stage. The producer has played his part tragically and the wholesaler has trod the boards with at least a verisimilitude of heroism. But the retailer has lingered in the wings—the vociferations of pit and gallery have so far been wasted on him. The property-man (Wall Street) has emitted thunder and lightning, to no effect." The Associated Dress Industries in convention at Atlantic City recently urged retailers to cut prices and unload their goods as fast as possible. "Cut a loss, and let a profit run," is a Wall Street motto recommended to retail merchants by the Wall Street Journal, and the advice is echoed generally by the financial press. On all sides we hear that the situation "is up to the retailer." President Sabin of the Guaranty Trust Company says in the Guaranty News that the most important step which must be taken in the business world is "for retail merchants to realize that they, too, must meet the inevitable economic trend and adjust their prices to meet the new conditions." Mr. J. H. Tregoe tells credit-men dining in New York that "manufacturers and jobbers have taken their losses like real men recently, but many retailers today are blocking business progress because they are unwilling to take a temporary loss." For this reason the Commercial and Financial Chronicle finds manufacturers, wholesale dealers, and jobbers arrayed "against the retail merchants in pretty much all sections of the country." The New York Evening Post's Boston financial correspondent thus presents some of the "obvious reasons" why the retailer must for his own sake, and for the sake of business generally proceed forthwith to cut prices to the bone:

"The public reads of great reductions in commodity prices, and is irritated on finding scant reflection of this in its purchasing power. Certain things it gets cheaper, but the number is not large enough nor are the commodities of the right sort to lessen appreciably the strain on consumers. Having waited so long for a general reduction in the cost of living, the public is disposed to see it through.' It is a question of staying power, with the odds all in favor of the public.

"The advertising columns are full of retailers' announcements of price reductions (very sizable in some cases), but these have almost an exigent appearance, tending to strengthen the consumer in his waiting attitude rather than otherwise. The consumer, in short, has become a good deal of a strategist. When he sees a tag embodying a mark-down of 33 per cent. he handles the goods with keen scrutiny, and his conclusion often is that the quality has declined quite as much as the price."

The consumer feels that the retailer must soon "apply the knife in earnest," in order to dispose of the season's goods. So he waits. Furthermore, he is compelled to wait because—in the East at least—people have less money to spend. Continues this writer:

"The retailer is the marplot in the situation. If his shelves are as full as many persons think, he has got to take sizable losses. The sooner he takes them the better it will be for everybody, himself included. For the feeling is strong that there will be good business in this country if only he can reach bed-rock. The wholesaler and the manufacturer are at sea, and must remain so until the retailer gages the situation for them. He, because he comes nearest the consumer, is their barometer, and at present he is not functioning with any approach to exactitude. Certainly he has not yet afforded any indication as to when they can safely put on more sail: if anything, he creates a fear that they may have to run under bare poles."

"Consumers in the Saddle" is the heading of a Wall Street Journal editorial which notes the passing of the day when "any storekeeper could put goods behind his counter and some one would clamor for them without regard to price." In other editorials this daily comments:

"From every part of the country comes evidence that the retailers have been the greatest obstacle to readjustment. Wholesale-price reductions have been going on since early this year. In the past month farm products declined 13.3 per cent., and are now 28 per cent. less than a year ago. Wholesale food prices dropped 8½ per cent. in October, and raw materials, fabrics, and clothing have tumbled. Yet retailers charge inflation prices.

"In consequence woolen and cotton mills are running on part time and the consumption of cotton in October was the smallest in the war period. In every industry manufacturers are waiting for retailers to place orders; and the retail shelves are not being cleared because the public will not buy at the prices prevailing during the prosperity madness. . . .

"The retailer who looks at his goods as worth what they cost him months ago is courting the same kind of experience as the farmers who held wheat for $3 and now must sell for half that, or still less if they hold longer. The only ones to profit by this will be receivers and trustees in bankruptcies."

Labor, according to the bulletin of the National City Bank of New York, insists that wages should not be lowered to correspond with wholesale prices, because retail prices have not come down in proportion. So, again, it is "up to the retailer," and we read further:

"He is the distributor and it is charged that he is blocking the flow of goods instead of helping it. His excuse is that he has goods which cost him high prices and he wants to work them off without loss before dropping to the new levels. It is to be said in his behalf that the price records of the Bureau of Labor show that retail prices generally lagged behind wholesale prices on the rising market, as they frankly do on the falling market. The report of the Federal Trade Commission on the flour industry, recently issued, shows that during the period 1913-18 wheat rose 160 per cent., flour at wholesale 146 per cent., and flour at retail 118 per cent.

"There was much discussion while prices were rising over the point whether a retailer was justified in basing his prices upon replacement costs, and popular opinion generally held that he was not. We have pointed out in comments upon war-time profits that a dealer would need the profits of a rising market to meet the losses of a declining market. The proper basis for prices at all times is replacement costs, for there is no assurance that a dealer can control prices on any other basis. There is no certainty that he can sell goods at what they cost him."

A good many fortunes running into the millions of dollars, and at least two that were in excess of a score of millions, have been sadly decimated by the 1920 bear market. Holders of great blocks of securities not fully paid for were disposed to hold them for higher prices, just as so many owners of commodities held on and on waiting for better markets on which to liquidate their obligations. The result has been rush orders for the Wall Street salvage corps, and a great deal of the activity that may be looked for during the next month or so will probably be in connection with the efforts of banking and other interests to remarket securities taken over which if liquidation were attempted now would mean more serious losses for all concerned.

Of course, each time one of the sore spots in the Street is opened and drained the financial body is that much nearer cure. The underlying strength of our country in money and brains and resources is too vast to permit of any utter collapse or even any long extended business prostration, especially at a time when the world is crying for work to be done.

The inauguration of Obregon as President of Mexico initiates, it is hoped, an era of real peace and prosperity in that country, and there is reason to believe that our own people will be large sharers therein. As a matter of fact, tentative arrangements are under way for financing the current Mexican government needs by Wall Street interest and there has been of late a great deal of buying by strong interests of Mexican government bonds on the theory that the new Mexican government will make it one of its first duties to rehabilitate Mexican credit. It seems remarkable that even in these whirligig years Mexican bonds should be in demand at any price, when the bonds of certain European governments of former high financial rating seem to find scarcely any demand whatsoever.—The Trader.

In the circumstances it is also natural that intending buyers should hold aloof, and particularly so as the first of the year inventories are close at hand and the number of business casualties may be expected to increase decidedly. One sign of the times is the number of bargain sales advertised by the department stores, which is rather exceptional at this time of year. On the other hand, it is the retail stores that have been among the worst offenders at profiteering and the most obstinate in their refusal to cut prices of goods on their shelves even when they could be replaced at prices very much below inventory cost.

Independent interests in the steel trade are getting down to the Steel Corporation level of prices, and even then little business is moving, so that we may soon look for cuts under the Steel schedules.

Non-ferrous metals have gone to new low prices all around without as yet stimulating much new demand. Copper metal is well toward the 13-cent level which in former periods of depression has often been about bottom. As the metal can not be produced for the present market price and as output is being curtailed right and left, it would seem reasonable to expect the surplus to be absorbed to such extent within four to six months as will permit of a turn in the tide of prices.

In this readjustment period, with prices of securities, as well as those of commodities, undergoing deflation, many investors are apprehensive lest the dividends on their holdings be reduced or suspended. That has happened in a number of cases, but there are not a few issues which have been tested both by time and panic and whose position appears strong in these trying times. Below is a list of stocks whose issuing companies went through the panicky years of 1907 and 1912 without missing a single dividend, and whose surpluses have since generously increased:

The Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company announce that they have taken a lease on the second floor of the Western Union Building, on Montgomery Street at Pine, and will occupy their new quarters on February 1st. This is the fourth time that the company has been compelled to enlarge its offices since Carlos S. Greeley, manager of the San Francisco territory, came up from Los Angeles and opened an office in June, 1919.

Formal announcement was made last week of the opening of Mitchum, Tully & Co., the most recent addition to the investment banking business in San Francisco. The personnel includes George E. Jones, George W. Weeks, Herbert A. Northon, Jasper W. Tully, and Colis Mitchum, all of whom are well known in the financial district and who have been associated with local bond houses for many years. Offices have been established in the American National Bank Building.

In addition to handling local securities the new firm will act as correspondent of Kidder, Peabody & Co. of Boston and New York.

This connection will enable the local house to offer to California investors the recommendations of one of the old line Eastern financial institutions. Kidder, Peabody & Co. had its inception in 1838, and has continued under the present name since 1865. As a banking institution its scope is world-wide, and through its correspondents in Europe and this country it has built up an enviable reputation as a financial institution of the ultra-conservative type.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company is offering first mortgage and refunding twenty-year 8 per cent. gold bonds of Kansas City Power and Light Company to yield 8 per cent. The company controls power and light business of Kansas City, Missouri, and adjacent territory and cities. Missouri public service commission gives the company's properties a value of $22,400,000. Funded debt, including these bonds, is $14,755,500. Earnings will show substantial increase in 1921 because of completion of new power plant.

During the first eleven months of 1920 corporation financing in the United States exceeded $3,050,000,000, according to the December monthly letter of the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank. The total was utterly unprecedented and included $2,224,000,000 borrowed by industrial corporations. The indications are that the total compilation of new financing during 1920 will break all records for the loans made to foreign governments and foreign municipalities have been beyond precedent. Most of the loans have been lodged with real investors for income-producing purposes. In some cases, however, unsold bond holdings remain in the hands of the syndicates, which will dispose of them from time to time as market conditions permit. It has been in many respects a remarkable bond market, for the United States has acted as banker for the rest of the world at a time when our own government was borrowing heavily through the sale of short-term treasury certificates of indebtedness. Because of the declining tendency in commodity prices, however, it is probable that the output of new industrial securities will diminish for a time at least. But the new year is likely to be one of heavy financing for account of the railroads, the public utilities, foreign governments, and for undertakings designed to increase the supply of American funds abroad. Besides these requirements there are exceptional demands in connection with the new building operations which will absorb a large amount of capital, as this country is still heavily short of housing facilities. With the decline in the price of building materials and in other costs, the indications point to heavy investments in dwellings, apartments, and new business structures during the coming months.

Among those participating in the offering of $10,000,000 Pacific Gas and Electric Company first and refunding mortgage gold bonds, twenty-year, 7 per cent., Series "A," are E. H. Rollins & Sons, George H. Burr & Co., and the Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company. These bonds are exempt from all personal property taxes in California, the price (99 and accrued interest) yielding about 7.10 per cent.

The Pacific Gas and Electric Company is recognized as one of the largest of the well-established and successful public corporations in the United States. The electric business of the company or of its predecessors has been in continuous and successful operation for more than forty years, and the gas business for more than sixty-five years.

The men in charge of the affairs of the company are the same men who organized in the year 1914 the A.M.I.E. that operated the ferry between Mare Island Navy Yard and Vallejo. Their efforts were so successful that all stockholders received 8 per cent. per annum on money invested, and, in addition, when that company sold its business and equipment to the Six-Minute Ferry, in 1919, each stockholder received more than $2.50 for each dollar invested.

THE LATEST BOOKS.

Ludendorff Explains.

We are beginning to have a furtive regard for General von Ludendorff. He has already given us two large volumes of "War Memories," from which we dissect the picture of a grim and stern man, without personal ambition, of the strict soldier type, fair and courteous to his enemies, a disciplinarian and an ascetic. Now he gives us two more volumes on "The General Staff and Its Problems," intended, of course, primarily for German consumption, but perhaps all the more important on that account.

The author thinks that the statesmen lost a war that the soldiers might have won, and he publishes these voluminous documents in order to establish his contention. In the middle of October, 1918, he is still urging on the chancellor that one last effort he made to spur the nation to a frenzy of defense. He says, "I can only repeat my earnest request, work up the nation! Sweep it off its feet! Can't Herr Ehrt do that? It must be done."

General von Ludendorff is evidently a man of prodigious energy—literary energy. One wonders how he found time to write so much, and at the same time to command armies in the field. Nothing escapes him. He disavows all intention to interfere with political affairs except as they may bear on the fate of the army. But then everything has a bearing on the fate of the army, and so the general writes about everything. His energies in this way were prodigious, and more than once they brought him a smart snub from the emperor. All this makes curious reading, and it goes some way to remove our conception of the superhumanism of German efficiency. The author does not seem to think much of the efficiency of his own government. Elsewhere we have comments on purely military matters, on the terror inspired by the British tanks, on the relative fighting merits of his enemies, but there is no malice or spite or rancor. General von Ludendorff has added substantially to our knowledge of the war and of the part played by Germany. Probably he would not like to be called a Puritan. He may not even know the word. None the less there is a suggestion of the Puritan about this inflexible figure, at least of the Puritan without the piety.

THE GENERAL STAFF AND ITS PROBLEMS. By General Ludendorff. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

Seen on the Stage.

"Seen on the Stage" is a collection of critical papers by Clayton Hamilton, the American playwright and dramatic critic. The book is to be taken, according to the author, as a sort of commentary suffix to three preceding volumes in which Mr. Hamilton has expounded his theory of playwriting and production. It is, therefore, only repercussions of his philosophy of the theatre that the reader can glean from this volume of brief essays.

The papers presented hear on a multitude of phases of acted drama. For the most part they are sound dramatic criticism—a fact that makes it a pity they are not better written. Mr. Hamilton has a naive weakness for such bombastic phrases as "the lantern of the world, the high Acropolis," and "in the record of eternal literature." The author shows a catholic taste, but stands foursquare for craftsmanship, "style," and beauty.

Among other things the book is valuable for disseminating information about such generally little-known phases of the drama as the "Jewish Art Theatre" and "Le Theatre du Vieux Colombine."—R. G.

Lady Lilith.

If Mr. Stephen McKenna would use his extraordinary powers of narrative and characterization on real human beings he might easily write a novel of the first rank instead of novels of shining fluff and foam. "Lady Lilith," we are told, is to have a sequel. That, indeed, is quite evident. When Lady Barbara Neave sets out to conquer the man who has been indifferent to her and then elaborately punishes him by an insincere refusal that sends him into the army we are sure that we shall hear more about Lady Barbara, whose surprising capacity for getting herself into vicious sorts of mischief has not been lessened by experience. At the same time the rejected lover is a stick and a prig and we can not understand why Lady Barbara should fall in love with him. Our old acquaintance, Sonia, makes a minor appearance on Mr. McKenna's new stage. It is to be hoped that he will keep her in the background. It is all done with surprising cleverness, but we wonder if these people are really worth while. But actually we do not wonder at all. We know that they are not.

LADY LILITH. By Stephen McKenna. New York: George H. Doran Company.

Satire and the Novel.

"Laughter throws a far more illuminating ray on the laughter than the laughed at, for it indicates, not only taste and mood, but the trend of one's philosophy. . . . For not only as a man thinks, but also as he laughs and exults and censures and suffers, so is he." Thus Frances Theresa Russell in a book whose tone and content belie its uncomplaisingly academic title, "Satire in the Victorian Novel." And indeed the things at which the Victorian laughed, and the manner in which he laughed at them, with that critical laughter or laughing criticism which is satire, delineate his thinking and his feeling with a vigor of outline seldom found in "literary histories" of the period.

By virtue of its subject the book appeals inevitably to a limited audience, for there are still a depressingly large number of people with air-tight minds who regard "life" and "culture" as substance and shadow respectively, and as mutually inclusive. But the joke is on them in this case. Those fortunates in whom taste and opportunity have bred a love of the subtle web of literature, and an understanding of its significance, will follow up this elusive thread with real appreciation.

Victorian satire is interpreted as the literary manifestation of two great forces which began to permeate society in the Victorian age—namely Democracy and Science. In its transference from the standard poetic form of the preceding period to the field of prose fiction satire acquired a new subtlety and a new relation to life. From hald ridicule of human foibles it developed into a keen criticism of human society, and in its progress from the personal to the social it adopted also the scientific method, substituting analysis of causes for rancorous or sentimental exposure of effects.

There is much that is quotable in the volume, with the result that one is tempted to take for granted all the obvious merits of structure and style and browse among the writer's delectable parentheses.

Mrs. Russell claims firmly in her preface that she presents her subject neither as apologist nor enthusiast. She does not apologize for the satirists, certainly, and perhaps her coolly balanced and analytical treatment would acquit her of anything so violent as enthusiasm; but her idiom and viewpoint betray consanguinity with the satiric clan, and though one is not of necessity an "enthusiast" about one's own family, one usually cherishes a particularly friendly feeling for it. Also one usually criticizes it with exuberant candor. Therefore Thackeray, who has an "antique attitude towards women," is put in his place—i. e., the Victorian age—with a sweeping gesture when he is "guilty of the generalization not at his time discovered to be fallacious" and "burns considerable mediaeval incense at the feminine shrine—not caring much if a little smoke should blow into his idols' eyes."

With an ability for skilful phrasing and a rich familiarity with literature goes a slight mannerism in the too frequent adaptation of certain well-known locutions: "lacks that stimulus of a rebuff that turns earth's smoothness rough" ("Browning," comments the reader mentally); "an ecstatic premonition of some far-off divine event toward which the whole creation moves" (Tennyson). And though one feels that these are often not only legitimate, but inevitable, they tend to recur with the disturbing effect of an intermittent electric sign on a harmonious landscape.

But this is a minor detail. The book in its entirety has that clarity of treatment and stylistic poise which bespeak the best type (all too rare) of the mature academic mind. It is, however, much more than a literary treatise, in spite of its carefully scholastic form. It is pervaded by a gallant philosophy and quietly humorous attitude towards life which make its author a sympathetic interpreter of the highest type of satiric spirit—the type which goes with that "incorrigible human defiance of the ache of life and the agony of death." There is an essential bravery in the satiric spirit and its insistence upon truth. "Out of spiritual cowardice we conceal from ourselves the disturbing facts of life and purchase optimism at the easy price of sentimentalism," says this author, remarking later, with a characteristic twinkle, "To be able to fling back a jest into the face of the Sphinx is undeniably a poor equivalent for guessing her riddle, but it at least helps to take the edge off her inscrutability."—Doris Escount.

A SERIES OF HUMAN-INTEREST TALKS ON INSURANCE

NORMAN RUSHTON
The man who takes care

Facing insurance squarely

Insurance should be seriously considered.

Insurance is not an expense—nor is it a pall to remind us of unpleasant things.

It is the greatest privilege afforded us.

For a small cost we can assure the all-the-time security of those near and dear to us.

The protection may not be needed for a long time.

But, to succeed in your business, to be able to enjoy your home life, to take your full share of joy from every day of living, you need that knowledge of the security of your loved ones.

Not merely a pitiful bit of insurance. But a liberal, strong-shouldered bulwark against poverty, stress, hardship.

I'd enjoy chatting insurance with you—help you determine just what kind you should have.

You'll enjoy it, too—as your heart lightens in the satisfaction that you have provided well.

At your office or mine, or in your home if you prefer. Phone me and we can arrange a time to suit your convenience. My phone is Kearny 4048.

A Mysterious Disappearance.

In "She Who Was Helena Cass" we learn how difficult it is for a woman of youth, beauty, and social prominence to disappear. The author, Lawrence Rising, who has fabricated an ingeniously worked-out plot, using the device alternately of presenting a recital of events as they appear to the mystified and anxious on-looker and as they really are, has hit on a very efficacious plan for piquing the interest of the reader. And, although there is a certain credibility to the events, his invention does not give out, and Helena's strange and exciting adventures continue until the seeker-in-chief finally runs her down.

Lawrence Rising's very considerable familiarity with Spain enables him to use that country, its mountain roads and remote solitudes, as a very effective stage setting for the scene of Helena's disappearance. He shows acquaintance with the national type, with the Spanish inns; he knows the cutthroats and their methods, and, naturally, such acquaintance can only be pre-supposed by a knowledge of the language. Mr. Rising does not put on any "dog" over this knowledge, but tells his story directly and at times quite thrillingly.

Italy and the War.

Mr. Thomas Nelson Page was the American ambassador to Italy during the war. He is therefore in a peculiarly advantageous position to speak, not only of the facts, but of the sentiment behind the facts. Nor does he show the least evidence of having been unduly influenced by his environment.

Mr. Page rightly devotes much of his book to a presentation of certain phases of Italian history. Italy had her own reasons for joining the war over and above the general resentment against Teutonic aggression. She felt toward Italia Irredenta very much as the French felt toward the Rhine provinces. The Trentino and the Adriatic coast she believed to be Italian territory stolen from her by Austria. If she seemed to bargain with the Allies it was only that she might not find at the end of the war that an open wound was still open and that her feud with Austria was to remain as acute as ever. There were other matters nearly equally vital to Italy—the Balkans, for example—on which she wanted a preliminary understanding. If she went to war, and this was hardly ever in doubt, she wanted to be sure that the whole mess was cleaned up, that no roots were left to bring forth more of the evil fruit. Italy's entrance into the war was in no way dependent upon the will of this, that, or the other minister. The masses of the people had fully decided upon war and they would have tolerated no ministry that was not of their mind. Their turbulences were instantly stilled as soon as war was declared. Mr. Page has written a valuable book and a needed book. It shows the justice of the Italian cause.

ITALY AND THE WORLD WAR. By Thomas Nelson Page. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Winsome Winnie and Other New Nonsense Novels.

"Winsome Winnie and Other New Nonsense Novels" is, if possible, better than Stephen Leacock's former books, in that it is less nonsensical and more satirical, and yet nonsensical enough. Whereas Max Beerbohm has brilliantly parodied the best modern English writers, Mr. Leacock comes forward with a volume of much-needed satire on the worst forms of prevalent fiction. Such satire is not to be considered merely as pleasant nonsense for a spare hour's reading. It is serious criticism. All the constructive criticism in the magazines is not so effective as one volume of this sort. This statement applies not so much to writers—who are for the most part impervious to criticism—as to readers. The intelligent reader has a sense of humor and the clever satire of a book like "Winsome Winnie" makes its point for him. In a phrase, Mr. Leacock shows the absurdity of a patent style.

In his latest book the author has parodied the sentimental novel (he labels it 1875, but in reality it flourishes still); the personal reminiscence (of no possible value, literary or historic) so dear to the "Heart and Home" magazines; the rather passé political novel; the current mystery story; the shipwreck-love story; the novel of the future; the civil war novel; and a typical ghost story. They are all excellent, but probably the most needed is that of the self-important woman who inflicts the public with the trivial narrative of her experience under pretext of its being of human interest, and that of the desert-island love story.

It is a pity that there are not more writers altruistic enough to prove the reductio ad absurdum of such "nonsense."—R. G.

The history of the relations between the High Command and the German Imperial Government as revealed by official documents.

The tree, brilliant with candles and tinsel and bending under its load of gifts, has become so indispensable as a part of our Christmas that we can hardly imagine a celebration of the festival without it. We think of it as an immemorial institution, and it is very ancient. Throughout Europe it has been popular since the middle ages at the very least, while learned men disagree as to whether its real origin should be traced to Ygdrasil, the tree of life in Scandinavian mythology, or to one of the customs of the old Roman harvest festival, the Saturnalia. But among English-speaking peoples it has been so recently introduced that it may almost be called an innovation upon the historic Christmas. In England itself it was almost unknown before the middle of the last century, although English travelers had seen the pretty custom in European households and written much in praise of it. To America it came earlier, brought by German immigrants to Pennsylvania, and perhaps also by the Dutch settlers of New York.

CHRISTMAS AT THE ALCAZAR.

"The Things That Count," with Alice Brady in the principal rôle, ran for nearly a year at the Playhouse, New York; pretty good for a play given over to the holiday spirit. It was an excellent idea of the Alcazar people to capture the play for the holiday season, since it shows the awakening of the Christmas spirit in the selfish heart of a rich old woman whose home might have been filled with the sunshine created by childhood—if she had known how to enjoy it.

The author, Lawrence Eyre, has hit on the idea of making the selfish old woman—who has been so blind as to avoid practicing her profession of grandmother—the principal character of the piece. It is quite a happy conception, and also an amusing creation, that of the busy, hurrying do-nothing old girl who fills her life with trifles and bosses her entire world. It gives Emelie Melville a juicy rôle, and the veteran actress avails herself of her opportunity to the utmost.

Mrs. Hennaberry lands somewhere in the tenement district on a ridiculous errand. She finds herself in the home of her rejected, widowed daughter-in-law without knowing it and is hailed by the romantic little daughter, who is at that psychological epoch that all imaginative children pass through when all life is a dramatized fairy tale, as a fairy godmother. The fairy godmother, liking the rôle, moved by the signs of self-respecting poverty and by the attractiveness of the child, recklessly resolves to give a child party, as it is Christmas Eve. This heroic resolve she carries out, and the result is some party. There are garlands, toys, candies, and a Christmas tree.

The dirt-smutted street arabs, the high-tempered Hibernian and Italian neighbor enemies, and other weird fotsam and jetsam are gathered in, and vigorous old Mrs. Hennaberry, although somewhat perturbed by the regularly recurring outbreaks of the belligerent pair, is having the time of her life. So is the audience, for Mrs. Hennaberry, not being of the sentimental order, prevents the play from becoming sweetly sentimental. The slangy street urchin gives her impudence, hostilities rage and roar between the adversaries, but the stout-hearted old girl remains a dead game sport until sudden light comes to the daughter-in-law, who discovers that the generous stranger is the cold-hearted mother who had repudiated the family of her dead son. This precipitates drama into the scene, the way being finally paved, of course, for a grand family reconciliation. Everything is happy and lovely, and the audience, much refreshed, feels that it has been assisting at a very enjoyable Christmas party.

The company was called on to its full capacity, and enjoyed itself down to the ground.

Emily Pinter received a very pointed welcome, as she had been vacationing, and indeed all the popular principals received a cordial Christmas greeting as they entered. The children yowled a Christmas song, and it was good to see the indulgent interest on the faces of the company. Rafael Brunetto had a chance to exercise his long-silent singing voice, and Edna Peckham sang with taste and style. In fact the children, the company, and the audience all had a perfectly lovely time, and voted the play "great."

"THE MARRIAGE OF KITTY."

This piece was put on by Mr. Maitland this week in evident recognition of the gaiety of the holiday mood. Adapted from the French, it is delicately risqué in places, but the comedy features, being well blended with romance, hit off the tastes of the audience to a T. They laughed gayly at every point; in fact the little theatre rarely reaches a higher point of hilarity of mood in the audience than it has attained this week.

"The Marriage of Kitty" always seems to be a popular piece. Margaret Anglin played it here once, and although it is scarcely worthy of her powers, the audiences it drew testified to its success as a capacity drawer. It has been given other times, and its popularity is shown by the increased numbers that assembled on subscribers' night.

Mr. Maitland carries off honors this week. Mr. Smythe rather sauntering through the part of a middle-aged godfather—with too young a face, by the way. But Mr. Maitland does extra well with the rôle of that heavy swell, Sir Reginald Belsize, who is gifted neither with common sense nor brains, but who possesses that something that attracts liking and regard. Given a good dress-suit rôle and Mr. Maitland is on his native heath. Also his comedy pleased exceptionally well.

Auda Dee played the rôle of the wife satisfactorily, and her rebellious curly hair acted very nicely in its rôle of trying to be smoothed submissively flat when pretty Kitty struggled with her natural endowment and made herself temporarily into a prude and a fright.

This sort of thing women fairly love, for a coquettish woman's face is her palette, and she loves to see another woman building—or unmaking, as in this and in Maugham's play—its beauty and charm.

Mary Norris played the rôle of the adventuress satisfactorily, giving due prominence to the jealous rages of the deposed charmer, although she is rather dramatic in temperament for light comedy.

A meal served in the play, apparently an entire meal, was another link in the chain which bound Sir Reginald to the quick-witted Kitty. Nobody ever eats a stage meal, but it is always an interesting function on the stage, and this one was a particularly entertaining one.

Altogether "The Marriage of Kitty" in its frivolous way has proved a decidedly agreeable drawing-room attraction; and how we women do love romantic drawing-room comedies!

THE ORPHEUM.

Just a working average bill this week, the best number being Victor Moore and Emma Littlefield in "Change Your Act or Back to the Woods." The act is planned to look absurdly casual. Victor Moore drifts aimlessly on the stage while the "supes"—players in his company—are busily engaged in clearing the stage from a supposed previous act. With his valuably ridiculous countenance, his vague air, and the matter-of-courtesness with which he accepts the men overlooking his existence while casually and abstractedly knocking him around with the scenery, the comedian speedily has the audience swept by gales of laughter. His partner, Emma Littlefield, is a valuable coadjutor in fun-making, and it is safe to say that the pair are great favorites all along the road.

Herbert Clifton, in merit and favor, is also a top-ranker this week. This performer does Julian Eltinge stunts, although he surpasses the better-known impersonator in his singing, for his assumed soprano voice has considerable range and the singer can go surprisingly high. As lovely woman Mr. Clifton is quite robust and materialistic in type. Unlike Julian Eltinge, he does not confine himself to making an exhibition, in his costumes, of the latest modes, for he appears in a charwoman's humble gingham, and also in some handsome Egyptian costumes, in which he postures with the angular Egyptian movements and gives some dances.

Mr. Clifton has hit on the idea of comicalizing his act by mixing the sexes of his costumes, the front view sometimes being picturesquely feminine and the rear ridiculously masculine. He is a clever general performer, sang Tosti's "Good-by" so femininely and pleasingly that it would be difficult indeed not to be fooled, travestied feminine follies, and made himself extremely popular.

The best of the remaining acts were by dancing couples, of whom Edith Clasper and her couple of assistants gave a good performance. There was some clever disappearing magic used in their act through the agency of a large silk car, which, as an effective finale, descended from the theatrical ether, carrying off the lady.

Ward and Dooley, a very youthful pair—Ward in a boyish costume, Ethel Dooley showing babyishly dimpled bare knees—did dancing with lariat-twirling interpolated; also bicycle stunts. The patter of the stripping was amusing, the costumes of the girl appropriately pretty and becoming, and the couple pleased by their blend of skill and ingenuous youthfulness.

"A Pressing Engagement" is amusing, and Barnes gave some clever imitations of vocal exercises and of flute-playing. The other acts were just stereotype.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last week's symphony concert gave a Beethoven programme, in celebration of the 150th anniversary of the birth of one of the greatest of the world's musical geniuses. A capacity audience demonstrated anew the ever-amazing fact that in this frivolous city there are enough people who love classical music to keep the torch steadily burning year after year.

The programme was very long, including the Egmont overture, the Concerto for Violin in D major, in which number Louis Persinger gave the long, sustained, delicate brilliance of the solo passages so admirably as to win innumerable recalls, and Symphony No. 7 was the one chosen; probably because each of its parts has many passages through which shines the sunshine of a happy mood.

On Christmas week there will be no concert, but on New Year's week a programme of particular interest is promised for the popular concert, which includes, among other notable pieces, the "Meistersinger" overture, the unfinished B Minor Symphony of Schubert, the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria," with violin obligato by Louis Persinger, and Liadow's "Enchanted Lake."

HILARIOUS FROTH.

The popularity of "The High Cost of Loving" seems perennial, and the Columbia patrons who enjoy this order of play still chortle with glee over its comedy unfoldings. I confess this kind of piece is not for me, and I regret that Frank Mandel, the San Francisco boy who wrote it, did not continue employing his abilities on a less frothy line of work. But at least he gives a story, and no doubt the piece has been so remunerative that the author rubs his hands gleefully and contemplates writing other pieces of the kind.

It is comforting to read on the Columbia announcements that their next attraction will belong to the genuine line of comedy. "3 Wise Fools" is by Austin Strong, a native San Franciscan, and son of two formerly well-known Bohemians of this city. The young man has made his mark as a writer of dramatic plays, but they do not seem as yet to have come our way. "3 Wise Fools" has had a year's run on Broadway and record seasons in other of the important Eastern cities. We are also assured of a good company, and so we who are weary of hilarious froth are feeling expectant and hopeful.

New Guide for Sailors.

Thanks to the efforts of a woman who has their welfare at heart, no American sailor just off a freighter or passenger liner for shore leave at Alexandria, Egypt; Singapore in the Far East, the free port of Danzig in the Polish corridor, or, indeed, any of the 300 ports that are visited by American ships, need go astray in seeking folks who speak his language and can minister to his needs. To find the consul, the dentist, the laundress, the boarding-house keeper or places of interest and wholesome amusement Jack has but to consult "The Seaman's Handbook for Shore Leave," through which Mrs. Alice S. Howard of Boston and Cleveland, author of the little volume, guides the American sailor in foreign ports.

Publication of the pocket directory of world ports was one of the first activities of the social service bureau for the merchant marine which Mrs. Howard established in wartime while assisting her husband, Henry Howard, who organized the recruiting service of the United States Shipping Board which manned the government-built merchant ships. Mrs. Howard continued her bureau after the armistice, with headquarters at Boston, and is now issuing a new and enlarged edition.

Of vest-pocket size, the book contains 164 pages giving information of more than 300 ports, containing also a table of foreign monetary units and the normal value of each in United States currency.

THE CIGARETTE IN HISTORY.

Although many efforts have been made to show that the use of tobacco was known to the ancient Greeks and Egyptians, they have never been successful. We can accept therefore that general belief that tobacco was first used by the aborigines and that Columbus was the first white man to chronicle its use. The Indians used the weed in a pipe and when the narcotic was introduced throughout Europe and Asia it was for centuries used either in pipes of fantastic design or in the rolls known as cigars. The Venetians are credited with getting the Turks to use tobacco, for the weed was cultivated in Italy. Bales of the seed of the nicotine plant found their way into Turkey and soon the Turkish tobacco industry was established.

This brings us to Mehemet Ali, underpaid worker in the tobacco fields of Kavalla, afterward a leader of the Turkish armies, who left the hoe for the sword and the sceptre and—the cigarette. With the bold bashi-bazouks Mehemet eventually became a pasha. His son Ibrahim was sent to the siege of Acre, the great Syrian stronghold. The chief of artillery, a Frenchman, at this siege early in the nineteenth century, had invented a powder spill, a kind of paper lamp-lighter filled with the explosive grains, which was thrust into the touch holes of cannon, in place of the old-fashioned and wasteful powder train which was laid on the piece and led into the hole. These spills were made of light and tough India or rice paper. Ibrahim Pasha was so pleased by the way in which the siege was conducted that he sent to the artillerymen some very fine Kavalla tobacco. This they mixed with the Syrian plant and greatly enjoyed as they smoked the mixture from a narghile or water pipe which, supplied with a number of mouthpieces, sufficed for an entire squad when off duty.

One evening as a crew was about to go on duty a shot from a Turkish fort smashed the beloved narghile to smithereens. The artillerymen could not leave the battery and they knew not where to get another narghile. A resourceful corporal rolling powder spills was struck with an inspiration. He made a number of spills in which he substituted grains of tobacco for gunpowder and then in a bantering fashion presented these little cylinders to soldiers off duty. He then put one of the spills in his mouth, saying that as long as he could not smoke any more he was going to blow off his head. When the match was applied there came forth instead of a slight explosion a wreath of incense, and thus was born the cigarette.

Old Ibrahim was amused when he heard how much spill paper was being used, and said as he pointed to a strategic place in the walls of Acre, "Make a breach there and you shall have all the paper and tobacco that you need." The deed was done in two days.

This new style of smoking tobacco in paper rolls gained in favor as Mehemet Ali asserted his sway over Egypt and from Cairo it spread to the European capitals through the diplomatic services of the various nations.

In Russia the cigarette grew in popular favor and in the early 'forties cigarettes were sold in that nation which were partly Turkish and partly made of a light tobacco grown in the United States.

A Chicago Tribune correspondent relates that in his presence was a Bolshevik who was sent for firewood. Instead of cutting a small tree near-by, he took a wheel from a new wagon, and with twice the labor hewed the wood away from the iron work and threw the broken pieces on the fire.

The largest farm in the world is managed by a former American, Charles Noble, at Nohelford, Alberta, Canada. It has more than 18,000 acres under cultivation, and a return of $1,000,000 is expected on it this year.

The Curran Theatre.

"Nightie Night" will be the attraction at the Curran for two weeks, beginning tomorrow night, coming fresh from its run of an entire season at the Princess Theatre. This in itself is a strong recommendation for Adolph Klauer's comedy.

The critics were unanimous in proclaiming "Nightie Night" the smartest farce-comedy that has been produced in years, and praised Adolph Klauer very highly for the excellence of the production. The first scene shows the interior of a Pullman chair car. The second scene shows the drawing-room of an up-to-date apartment house, and here one gets a sense of thoughtfulness and good taste. It is the first instance in which the Venetian eighteenth-century chinoiserie has been used as a general motif of a stage scene.

The Columbia Theatre.

Heralded as one of the real comedy hits of the past ten years, "3 Wise Fools" comes to San Francisco direct from the East. It will be the unusual attraction at the Columbia Theatre for a limited engagement, starting Monday night, December 27th.

A number of facts contribute to make the coming engagement of "3 Wise Fools" of more than usual interest. The comedy was written by a San Francisco man, Austin Strong, author of "The Toy-Maker of Nuremberg," "The Good Little Devil," "The Drums of Oude," and other plays. It comes here with the original New York cast.

In the leading rôles will be seen Claude Gillingwater, Harry Davenport, and Howard Gould as the three old bachelors, sunk into a rut of monotonous living. These three characterizations, one the gruff financier, one the physician, steeped in theories, and the other a judge, are masterpieces in the hands of the talented trio. Others in the big cast include Helen Menken as leading lady, Donald Foster, Wallace Fortune, Harry Forsman, Minnie Remaley, Harry Leighton, Herbert Saunders, and Joseph Garry..

The Alcazar Theatre.

"Come Seven," a recent New York sensation, is the Alcazar's New Year novelty, commencing at next Sunday's matinee. It will be great fun to see all the Alcazar players in blackface, visualizing the characters in Octavus Roy Cohen's Southern negro classics that have moved a nation of magazine readers to laughter. Cohen in his dramatization has contrived many effects that the printed page can not convey. The characteristics of the modern Southern negro, with his rich humor, simplicity, and superstitions, are accurately depicted, not burlesqued. The cast include Dudley Ayres as the confiding Urias Neshitt; Ben Erway as the foppish confidence operator, Florian Shappey; Elwyn Harvey and Emily Pinter as chocolate belles; Edna Peckham as the fascinating Palm Beach manicurist; Charles Yule and Anna MacNaughton as pompous Lawyer Chew and his wife; Henry Shumer as the dusky detective; Al Cunningham, Walter Emerson, and Edith Searles in roll characters. There will be two performances New Year's Eve at 7:30 and 9:45.

"For the Defense," the mystery of a fake Hindu doctor's murder, to be given for the first time on this Coast Sunday, January 2d, was a six months' sensation in New York recently, featuring Richard Bennett at The Playhouse. It is by the author of the famous melodrama, "On Trial."

The Maitland Playhouse.

"Pomander Walk," written by Louis Napoleon Parker, author of "Rosemary," will be the theatrical attraction at the Maitland for the holiday week commencing with subscribers' night next Monday evening. It is one of the best-written plays of the age, as well as one of the most delightful. Parker has clever lines, delightful situations, and most charming comedies.

Not only is "Pomander Walk" well suited to the holiday season, but it is well adapted to theatre parties, and many have been arranged for this charming performance.

The opening performance to the public will be the Tuesday matinee. There will also be a matinee on New Year's Day.

The Orpheum.

Emily Ann Wellman, who is again in vaudeville, will play "The Actor's Wife" at the Orpheum next week on the special Happy New Year show. She will be supported by Richard Gordon and company. The piece is an intense hit of drama, utilizing Miss Wellman's creations in staging and new lighting. It affords not only an opportunity for the young actress' histrionic talents, but also for her talents as a producer.

Owen McGivney will present "Bill Sikes," a quick-change dramatic episode from Dickens, in which he will enact six rôles. The whole story will be told in the short space of half an hour and the six characters will be introduced. Each will be played by McGivney, and each will be as distinct in make-up and characterization as though the parts were acted by a company, every member of which was engaged for a particular rôle. McGivney leaves the stage as Fagin, the villainous trainer and receiver of thieves, and an instant later returns as the girl who loves Bill Sikes—and so on throughout the performance.

Oscar Loraine returns to San Francisco, after an absence of more than a year. The sensation which he originally caused when he began accompanying his violin playing with a monologue has grown in intensity.

Harry Anger and Netta Packer, well-known humorists, will offer a character duologue described as a combination of wit, wisdom, and humor.

Phil Roy and Roy Arthur in "A Chinese Restaurant" will stage a china-breaking contest. Roy is an exceedingly dextrous juggler and his associate, Arthur, is as awkward as his partner is nimble.

Lillian Price and Bud Bernie in "Tunes and Laugh Fashions of 1920" will bring a combination of songs, fun, and music. Miss Price stands very high in the younger set of players.

Lillian's Comedy Pets, seven small dogs, will delight with their repertoire of clever tricks.

Florenz Ames and Adelaide Winthrop will remain another week with their thumbnail revue, "Alice in Blunderland."

Tetrazzini.

Mme. Tetrazzini, who under the management of W. H. Leahy is having the greatest tour of her career, will be heard in concert at the Exposition Auditorium, Easter Sunday afternoon, March 27th, under the local direction of Frank W. Healy.

"You Never Can Tell," one of the most popular of the plays written by George Bernard Shaw, is to be the opening bill for the coming year, 1921, at the Maitland Playhouse. Many requests for this performance have been received by Director Arthur Maitland.

Lincoln's first little love affair is supposed to have been with a Miss Betsy James, who lived with relatives on a plantation near Memphis. Lincoln, returning from a flatboat trip to New Orleans, asked for work on the plantation, explaining that river gamblers had got his money. It was on this trip that Lincoln had first seen negro slaves in irons, and sold like cattle at the old slave market in New Orleans. He spoke of them to Betsy James. She laughed, displaying no pity for the slaves, telling him they were "well treated." "They may be well treated on this plantation. I'll admit they are," said Lincoln, "but you will see the time when these people will be as free as we are." That remark set aflame the Southern blood in Betsy James. "I will not keep friendship with a man of your belief, sir," she is said to have told him. "I am sorry," replied Lincoln, and they had each other good-by.

COLUMBUS IN DANGER.

The memory note of the average American to the effect that "Columbus discovered America in 1492" may have to be revised. There is a chance that the word "discovered" is all wrong. The possibility of the continent having been discovered 'way back at the end of the fifth century by Buddhist missionaries seems to be very good.

In the early days of the present century Professor John Fryer of the University of California did original research on the matter of the supposed early visit of Asiatic Buddhists to America, and he discovered facts which he set forth in an article printed in "Harper's Encyclopedia" in 1902 which convinced many at the time that these early missionaries were the real discoverers of America.

Now come further reports from Mexico of the recent discovery of hieroglyphics on the foundation stones of the pyramids of San Juan Teotihuacan, twenty-seven miles northeast of Mexico City, which are pronounced similar to symbols still in use in the Chinese language by Fong Tsiang Kuang, Chinese Chargé d'Affaires at Mexico City (says the Kansas City Star).

He says the words "sun," "eye," and "city" are clearly depicted in the newly-discovered hieroglyphics. This new find seems to lend support to Professor Fryer's proposition of an early-day visit of Chinese to America.

The article by Professor Fryer setting forth his reasons for belief in a fifth-century visit to America by Buddhists follows, in part:

"The direct evidence of this early Buddhist mission, though based chiefly on Chinese historical documents, covers also the traditions, histories, religious beliefs, and antiquities to be found in America, extending all the way down the Pacific Coast from Alaska to Mexico, as well as to many localities considerable distance inland.

"From early times the Chinese classics, as well as the historical, geographical, and poetical works, allude to a country or continent far to the east of China, under the name of Fusang, or Fusu.

"The narrative of only one visit to Fusang is on record in Chinese history, namely, that of Hui Shen, a native of Cophene, or Cabul, which was the great centre of Buddhist missionary exertions in early times. Since this account was considered of sufficient importance to deserve a place in the imperial archives of the Liang dynasty and is handed down with the full authority of the great Chinese historian Ma Tuan-Lin, there should be no doubt as to its authenticity.

"The narrative states that there was a Buddhist priest named Hui Shen, originally a native of Cabul, who, in the year 499 A. D., during the reign of the Emperor Yung Yuan, came from the country of Fusang to Kingchow, the capital of the dynasty of Tsi, situated on the River Yangtse. The country being in a state of revolution, it was not until the year 502 that he reached the court of the Emperor Wu Ti, of the new Liang dynasty. The emperor treated him as an envoy from Fusang and deputed one of the four principal feudal lords, named Yu Kei, to interrogate him concerning the country and to take down his story in writing.

"Among other things, Hui Shen said that the people of Fusang were formerly in ignorance of the doctrines of Buddha, but during the reign of the Chinese Emperor Ta Ming of the Sung dynasty, or A. D. 458, there were five hikhshu, or Buddhist monks, from Cabul, who traveled there and promulgated the knowledge of the doctrines, books, and images of Buddhism."

The story of Hui Shen is told in some detail, but all descriptions of the country of Fusang and its people and customs mark them as applying to the Pacific Coast in general and Mexico in particular, according to Professor Fryer. Many names and religious beliefs and customs of the nations of Mexico, Yucatan, and Central America show Asiatic influence, he says.

"When we come to look for visible traces of Buddhism among the antiquities of Mexico we are soon amply rewarded," Professor Fryer's article continues. "Images and sculptured tablets, ornaments, temples, and pyramids abound that can not well be ascribed to any other source with a show of reason. Among these may be mentioned: An image of Buddha at Palenque, sitting cross-legged on a seat formed of two lions placed back to back, closely representing images found in India and China; a perfect elephant's head sculptured on the walls of Palenque, the elephant being the usual symbol of Buddha in Asia and no elephants being found in America; an elaborate elephant-faced god found among the Aztecs, which is evidently an imitation of the Indian image of Ganesha."

The Paisley Shawl.

The story of the Paisley shawl forms one of the shortest and most romantic chapters in the modern history of industry. The manufacture of these beautiful things was begun, reached a great height of prosperity and became extinct in the space of a little over eighty years. No Paisley shawl has been woven since 1880, and none is likely ever to leave the looms again. The shawl had its origin in the ambition of the Paisley weavers to produce on the loom the amazingly elaborate patterns wrought by the needle of the Cashmere shawls that had been sent home from the East by Scottish officers and traders to their womenfolk.

The Paisley weavers were notable craftsmen, and they produced a shawl which excelled its prototype in beauty of design and richness of color. Their success was the reward of patience, skill, taste, and a delicacy of touch which, experts say, has probably never been equaled before or since in the weaving craft. A common price for one of these shawls in the days when they were not a rarity was $20, and they were worn by women of all classes in Scotland except the very poor. Then fashion decreed that the Paisley shawl should no longer be the mode and its fate was sealed. Queen Victoria gave the dying industry a new but brief lease of life when she bought seventeen of the famous shawls and wore one at the baptism of the prince who was to become King Edward.—Westminster Gazette.

VANITY FAIR.

Amid the clash of controversy on the fate of nations, how few among us have the wit to discuss the real importances, to identify the hinges on which events turn. Sometimes they are such tiny hinges. It is of no use for one to plead with us to sustain the league of nations, for example, if the color of his tie is an abhorrent one, or if the style of his hair-dressing suggests the bartender. We may believe that we judge all things in the light of a cold and clear intellect, but actually we do nothing of the sort. We are the slaves of our subtler sentiments. We are governed by our small affinities and antipathies. The destiny of a nation may be affected by a handsfak, a smile, or a flower in the buttonhole. It is the seeming insignificances that weigh the heaviest in the scheme of things.

History is full of examples of the importance of unimportant things. When the great international conference assembled at Berlin at the close of the Russo-Turkish war there was much speculation as to the dominating influence that would disclose itself. It was an august occasion and no point of ceremonialism had been overlooked. What was the consternation of the decorated, uniformed, and bejeweled potentates of Europe when Bismarck produced a cigar, lighted it, and proceeded to emit the usual volumes of eddying smoke. It was almost like lighting a pipe in church or playing marbles at a funeral. It was a master stroke in diplomacy. Bismarck had taken the first trick. He had almost established his position as leader of the great congress. Never was there a more sublime instance of German propaganda. Nothing could take from Bismarck the status of the originator, the innovator, but it would never do to allow him to hold it without a challenge. If the Bismarckian cigar was allowed to be the only glowing point at that great conference table, then it became, ipso facto, the light that all the diplomats must follow. Bismarck became cock of the walk and Deutschland über Alles was no mere figure of speech. And it was done with a cigar.

Great Britain bestirred herself on the spot. Not so lightly was the palm of leadership to be torn from her grasp. But here a difficulty presented itself. Lord Beaconsfield did not smoke, had never smoked, could not now smoke. It made him sick. But this was no time for the intrusion of personal and physical disabilities. Either Lord Beaconsfield must smoke or take secondary place. Great Britain must sink forthwith to a subsidiary position in the comity of nations. It might mean the disintegration of the empire. And it must be said that that great statesman rose to the occasion. A cigar was produced from somewhere and the British plenipotentiary lit it with unskilled and trembling fingers. Whether he actually smoked it, deponent sayeth not. Perhaps it was one of the kind that smoke themselves. But at least there was a cigar and there was smoke. The situation had been saved. Bismarck was not allowed to maintain the pose of privilege. And after that every one smoked. Now the philosopher will see at once that the Bismarckian cigar was the most important event of the great Berlin Congress. If Lord Beaconsfield had not dared fate and nausea, the history of the whole world might have been different. A good cause, ability, eloquence would have served him not at all. Bismarck would have snatched the supremacy. He alone with the audacity to smoke would have ruled the Congress.

Having thus established the importance of unimportant things, the greatness of small things, the significance of insignificant things, and incidentally the way in which history ought to be written, we may seek an illustration nearer at home than the Berlin Congress. Let us consider, for example, the pregnant fact that Senator Harding is an enthusiastic golfer. It may be that this fact has already been recorded in various biographical sketches, all of them designed to show that the President-elect is a person very much like ourselves, which is about the worst compliment that could possibly be paid him, but which is always supposed to be a democratic decoration. But has any one perceived the true inwardness of Senator Harding's golfing proclivities? Probably not. Such ruminations are left for the philosophically wise, and they are few and far between, like the raisins in the cake that mother used to make. But would it not be becoming to inquire with whom the new President is likely to play golf?

Can we be indifferent to the bond of brotherly love, of domestic intimacy that exists between well-matched golf players? Now Senator Harding has been accustomed to play golf with Hale, Frelinghuysen, and Elkins. Watch those men. They will go far under the new administration. Able men, all of them. Doubtless we shall be called on to discuss their political capacities. But it might be more to the point to discuss their golfing capacities.

Now consider further the matter of the diplomatic corps. Weigh the significance of the fact that there is only one high-class diplomat now in Washington who can play a first-rate game of golf, and that one is the British ambassador, Sir Auckland Geddes. We may read congressional reports and study state papers to our heart's content. We may measure the pros and cons of every foreign problem, and we may even be credulous enough to believe that they will be settled by the pros and cons. But where is the enterprising reporter or special correspondent who shall reveal to us the confidences of the golf course, or include in his bulletins the interchange of profanities and policies overheard only by the winds of heaven and the taciturn and uncomplaining turf? It would be well for the other diplomats to sit up and take notice before it is too late. Let them learn golf or they will assuredly be worsted, and perhaps they will never even know why.

A waiter engaged at every Colchester Oyster Feast since 1902 has been complaining to an interviewer that the capacity of the guests is not what it used to be (says a London exchange). "I have often served fourteen dozen oysters to one man," he said, "and many guests would eat five or six dozen at the feast, but today few have more than two and a half dozen." This disconsolate waiter might brighten up if he had the opportunity of serving a customer with a capacity for oysters such as is described in the "Physiologie du Gout." "When I lived at Versailles," writes Brillat-Savarin, "I frequently met M. Laperte, who was very fond of oysters, but complained he could never get his fill of them. I determined to satisfy him for once, and invited him to dinner. I kept pace with him up to the third dozen, and then allowed him to go on alone. He swallowed oysters steadily for more than an hour, and I had to stop him after the thirty-second dozen, just as he remarked that he was beginning to enjoy his treat. We then dined, and Laperte acquitted himself with the vigor and appetite of a man who had long been fasting."

Another oyster maniac, known as Dando, figured regularly in the London police courts during the 'fifties. For the eight months of the year during which oysters are in season Dando would go from oyster shop to oyster shop, displaying his voracious appetite. If he could not get any one to pay for him he would plead poverty, and this led to his appearance again and again before the magistrates for obtaining food under false pretenses. Dando was the hero of a tale by Thackeray, and his memory was honored by a mock-heroic poem describing his lowly grave in Clerkenwell

That has become a place of pilgrimage,
And not the cockle-shell the pilgrim bears,
But shell of shapeliest "native" to be placed
In glistening row around that humble spot.

Dando's most famous rival was the "Irish Oyster-Eater," who died in 1839. Of him it is chronicled that the day before he finally took to his bed he devoured, for a trifling wager, twenty dozen oysters in nineteen minutes and thirty-five seconds.

The Samarkand.

When the Samarkand opens at Santa Barbara on January 1st a new word in American hotels will have been spoken. A world of beauty in a garden of thirty acres will have been created where a hundred guests may find every comfort of a home with no domestic care.

Single rooms or rooms en suite are furnished in exquisite taste by artists who know the value and effect of color. While brilliant notes of accents of color are used in each room, the general effect is quiet and restful. Every piece of furniture has been especially made, the rugs woven to order from wools to harmonize with the color in each room, and the walls and woodwork painted to complete the harmonious picture.

There are no detached little houses, but a series of rooms en suite opening to an arched corridor which leads to the main building. Beautiful painted Persian screens separate the corridor spaces into private terraces, one for each suite of rooms. These guest rooms en suite are built around a terraced garden where the rarest of tropical plants bloom throughout the year. The sitting rooms look into this garden, while the bedrooms have mountain, meadow, mesa, and ocean views. In each garden is a lily pond, like a great Persian carpet, dripping from one terrace to the terrace below until a small lake is reached.

This lake is bordered by a rock garden. Here color runs riot, tumbling into the quiet pools where rare lilies and lotus bloom. A rose pergola surrounds the lake and beyond is the bowling green—two acres of perfect lawn. There are also tennis courts and clock courts for golf. La Cumbre Golf Club is only six minutes away. This course is pronounced the finest in California. The guest at the Samarkand is a member of the La Cumbre Club, club dues being assumed by the hotel.

The entire building is of reinforced concrete and is fireproof. The architecture was suggested by the most beautiful designs in Persian buildings, but is modified to conform to the landscape and climatic conditions of Santa Barbara.

The Samarkand is under the management of A. K. Bennett, who announces that a few reservations may still be made for the fortnight following the New Year.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A proud young father telegraphed the news of his happiness to his brother in these words: "A handsome hoy has come to my house and claims to be your nephew." The brother, however, failed to see the point and wired back: "I have not got a nephew. The young man is an imposter."

The wife of a man who had enlisted in the navy handed the pastor of a church the following note: "Peter Bowers, having gone to sea, his wife desires the prayers of the congregation for his safety." The minister glanced over it hurriedly and announced: "Peter Bowers, having gone to see his wife, desires the prayers of the congregation for his safety."

"Next hoy!" exclaimed the teacher: "can you give a simile to the word maiden?" "Yes, miss," responded Johnny Summers; "a maiden is like cider." "Very good, Johnny. You see, boys," explained the teacher, who was of uncertain age and irascible disposition, "Johnny means that a maiden is sweet like cider." "Yes," broke in Johnny, "and grows sour with old age."

"Kind of hard to please women," Blinks sighed. "What now?" Jinks asked sympathetically. "My wife has harped so on how much more attention men paid to women before marriage that I had a big bunch of roses sent out to the house and took her a box of fine candy." "And wasn't she pleased?" "Oh, I dunno. She's been talking ever since about how much more sensible it would have been if I'd sent out a ham and brought home a new door mat."

A certain caddie, although ordinarily, his speech was quite normal, was apt to stammer badly when excited or surprised. One day he was caddyng for a well-known player, who on arriving at the seventh hole—a particularly difficult one—remarked: "I did this hole in three the other day." "What?" ejaculated the caddie. "Well, sir, all I can say is that you are a 1-1-1—" "Steady, hoy, steady!" interrupted the player, reprovingly. "You're a 1-1-1-lucky man, sir," concluded the stammering caddie.

"People are so used to paying war taxes that it has become as much a habit as eating and drinking," said Sid Grauman, and the other night I dreamed a dream that no doubt was true. St. Peter looked with wonder at the two rusty coppers which the passing soul had dropped into his hand. "Why, my good man," he asked, "what is this for?" "War tax," murmured the soul gloomily as it passed through the heavenly gates."

"Pan," said the colored youth, "A'd like you to expatiate on de way dat de telegraph works." "Dat's easy 'nuf, Rastus," said the old man. "Hit am like dis. Ef dere was a dawg hif 'nuf so his head could be in Bosting an' his tail in New Yo'k, den ef you tromp on his tail in New Yo'k he'd hark in Bosting. Understan', Rastus?" "Yes, pap! But how am de wireless telegraph?" For a moment the old man was stumped. Then he answered easily: "Jess preazactly de same, Rastus, wid de exception dat de dawg am 'maginary."

Ex-President Taft told at a literary dinner a story about a colored man. "A colored man," he said, "knocked at Mrs. Brown's back door and asked for a job of work. 'What's your name?' Mrs. Brown asked, for she liked the fellow's looks. 'Mah name's Poe, ma'am,' he answered. 'Poe, eh?' said Mrs. Brown. 'I suppose some of your family once worked for Edgar Allan Poe—did they?' The colored man's eyes bulged, and he struck himself a resounding whack on the chest. 'Why, ma'am,' he said, 'Ah is Edgar Allan Poe.'

For years a bitter feud had existed between the Browns and Robinsons, next-door neighbors. The trouble had originated through the depredations of Brown's cat, and had grown so fixed an affair that neither party ever dreamed of "making it up." One day, however, Brown sent his servant next door with a peace-making note for Mr. Robinson, which read: "Mr. Brown sends his compliments to Mr. Robinson, and begs to say that his old cat died this morning." Robinson's written reply was hither: "Mr. Robinson is sorry to hear of Mr. Brown's trouble, but he had not heard that Mrs. Brown was ill."

"Beg your pardon, sir, but you have it in your power to do me a great favor and one that I will gladly repay," said a stranger who entered the business offices of a bankrupt. "I am afraid you have made a mistake. I am of no use to anybody," said the bankrupt. "I have just failed for half a million, and with no assets." "So I heard." "You knew it, and yet you say I can be of service to you?" "Yes, sir; I beg you will not refuse." "But what can a miserable bankrupt like me do for any one?" "I want you to tell me, sir, how you got so much credit."

A negro was an important witness in a trial in the courtroom of a little town in the south of the U. S. A. and he was carefully coached by his lawyer and told exactly what to say. When Mr. Brown, the lawyer, left the negro just before the trial began, Ahe knew his evidence off by heart, but when he entered the crowded courthouse and saw the sea of faces all around him he suffered from a severe attack of stage fright. His lawyer stood up, and gently and kindly, and with a winning smile, said: "Now, Ahe, tell the judge and jury everything you know about the case." Ahe looked startled, and glanced fearfully around the court, then he gasped: "When I started fo' de courthouse dis mornin' dey wuz only two people in de world dat knew what I wuz to say—me and Massa Brown. Now Massa Brown am de only one dat knows."

A man from the north of Scotland was on a holiday in Glasgow. On Sunday evening he was walking along Argyl Street when he came upon a contingent of the Salvation Army, and a collection bag was thrust in front of his nose. He dropped a penny in it. Turning up Queen Street, he encountered another contingent of the Salvation Army, and again a smiling lass held a collection in bag in front of him. "Na, na!" he said. "I gied a penny tae a squad o' your folk roun' the corner just the noo." "Really?" said the lass. "That was very good of you. But, then, you can't do a good thing too often. And besides, you know the Lord will repay you a hundredfold." "Aweel," said the cautious Scot, "we'll just wait till the first transaction's feenished before we start the second."

Armin W. Riley, the efficient head of the "flying squadron" that hunts down profiteers for the Department of Justice, told a profiteer story at a Washington reception. "A sick profiteer," he said, "was told by a physician that he had only a short time to live. Accordingly he expressed a desire to confess his sins, and a divine was sent for. The divine entered the dying profiteer's chamber and the door was closed. An hour, two hours, three hours passed. Nothing was to be heard by the attendant nurses and physicians outside in the corridor save the steady, monotonous flow of the profiteer's confession, punctuated at brief intervals by exclamations of horror and indignation on the part of the divine. Lunch was sent into the sickroom, and the confession went on. The afternoon waned. The sun set. The night fell. The divine's dinner was carried to him. And still the profiteer continued to confess. Haggard and unstrung, the divine at last tottered forth at daybreak. 'Our unfortunate friend,' he said, 'is no more. He worked very, very hard; but at the time he passed away he had only carried his confession through the first year of the war.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

A Standardized Existence.
A visitor at large, I stand,
Beneath a standard sky—
Where everything is standardized
To please the standard eye.

Each tree is of a standard height,
Each building is the same;
Each man is uniform in weight,
And has a standard name.

Above there is a standard star
Beside a standard cloud,
And standard weather here prevails
To please the standard crowd.

The airplanes, motor-cars, and trains
Are standard to a T—
And only boats of standard make
Can sail the standard sea.

In standard moonlight lovers flout
Their standardized delight;
While standard cats meow about
With standard hoots in sight.

Such perfect uniformity
Exists throughout the land,
That birth itself is standardized
To meet the great demand.

With standard joy, and standard gain,
The standard people live;
And if there is one bit of pain,
'Tis such that standards give.

And when with pallid, measured art
The undertakers come,
The standard spirits all depart
To standard spirit-dom.

The Passionate Advertiser to His Love.

Dullest of poetsasters I
And weakest of elegiasts;
Give me your lips. They satisfy.
Kiss me again! The flavor lasts.

'Tis love that makes—you know the rest.
Our love shall kodak as it goes,
With pictures better than the best,
Geared to the road. Ask Dad—he knows.

Our bome shall be of softest stuff,
Wooltex and Satin-O and such; you Shall never find the going rough;
No metal, O my love, can touch you.

I am the Better Sort you need;
I'm glad as a Contented Cow.
My love endures. It's guaranteed.
... Eventually! Why not now?

In the swamps of Florida the hunting of "bee trees" is a profitable business. Record of wild honey deposits of more than 300 pounds in hollow trees has been noted. The trees are located by hunters who follow the flight of the bees. It requires keen eyesight and a compass.

An Arab laughs at the idea of walking in the street with his wife or of ever vacating his seat for a woman, and his wife walks behind him. He has no use for chairs, tables, knives, forks, or even spoons, unless they are wooden ones. Bedsteads, bureaus, and fireplaces are also considered worthless by him. On entering a house an Arab removes his shoes, but not his hat. He mounts his horse on the right side, while his wife milks the cow on the left side. He puts nearly all his compliments on the outside of a letter he writes. He sees to it that his head is always wrapped warmly, even in summer, and disregards his feet entirely, often going barefooted in the winter. He reads and writes from right to left. He eats little for breakfast, little for dinner, but at evening time, when the work of the day is done, he sits down to a hot meal swimming in oil or boiled butter. His sons eat with him, but the woman waits until his lordship is done.

CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL.

The Children's Hospital has been an outstanding health-restoring agency of San Francisco for nearly half a century. More than 160,000 patients have been cared for within its hospitable walls. Seventy-five thousand of these were women and children treated free or at less than cost. Lovers of children always have supported our work by voluntary contributions. Two thousand six hundred friends subscribed $45,000 to our Donation Day appeal for this year.

The $45,000, plus income from endowments, plus profits on pay work, has been invested in free and part pay services to the poor. The amount of free work for this year, expressed in money, is $83,000. Expressed in service, it represents 20,000 sick days, or a daily average of fifty-four occupied beds. During 1919 this service was represented by 15,687 sick days, costing $56,982. The hospital of 275 beds is in good shape, the staff and business departments well organized with modern facilities for good work.

The 1920 expenses of all departments are $302,000, representing 70,000 sick days, 2600 operations, 10,000 out patient services, forty-one nurses graduated, seven interns trained, 600 births.

The 1920 income will be $306,000. From patients, $211,000; interest on endowments, bequests, etc., $51,000; and the $45,000 Donation Day contributions. (Includes a special $37,500 bequest.)

A glance at the above figures shows that next year we must do less free work (which must not be necessary); reduce the quality of service (which we refuse to do); charge more for pay service (which would be unfair); increase our endowment (which we are trying to do), or ask the public for $75,000 (which we do).

The board of managers and officers pledge to the public that every dollar contributed will be made to do 100 per cent. economical service to the deserving poor.

Please remember that each $4 invested with us will insure twenty-four's hospital care to some poor child or woman and at the same time be of assistance in the education of nurses, young women physicians, and in other better health activities.

The Children's Hospital is a San Francisco institution, supported by San Francisco friends and operated for the benefit of unfortunate children of San Francisco.

We ask you to invest money and friendship with us and receive dividends in service to the less fortunate and in satisfaction to yourself.

Hotel Rafael.

Hotel men of the Bay region gathered Saturday evening at the Hotel Rafael as the guests of Manager W. C. Jurgens, who formally opened the hotel with a dinner-dance at which several hundred persons were present. Preceding the entertainment there was a meeting of the Northern California Hotel Men's Association. The hotel men went over the big hotel, which has been entirely redecorated, refurnished, and modernized. Many compliments were heard on the appearance of the house and predictions were heard that it will prove to be one of the most popular spots about the Bay in the near future.

The Palace of Fine Arts.

The number seven has always had a peculiar significance. On the seventh day of the seventh month a holy observance was ordained to the children of Israel, who feasted seven days and remain seven days in tents. The seventh year was supposed to be a Sabbath, or rest for all, and at the end of seven times seven there was to be a jubilee. Jacob served seven years to win Rachael for his wife. Noah had seven days' warning of the flood. Nebuchadnezzar lived seven years as a beast. Christ spoke seven times from the cross on which he hung seven hours. In Scripture there are seven resurrections mentioned. In the Lord's Prayer there are seven petitions. There were seven mysteries of the apocalypse revealed in the seven churches in Asia. In Revelations there is described seven lambs before the seven spirits of God, seven golden candlesticks, a book with seven seals, seven angels with seven trumpets, seven players, seven vials of wrath, seven kings, seven thunders, and a dragon with seven heads.

American women paid $750,000,000 for rouge, lip sticks, and perfume during 1919, according to government war tax returns.

SAN FRANCISCO

Home of Lincoln's Boyhood.

Restoration of the village of New Salem, where Abraham Lincoln worked as grocery clerk, fell in love with Ann Rutledge, carried the postoffice in his hat and whipped the champion of the "Clary's Grove boys," will be completed by next spring and, with the addition of the old Salem museum, will be thrown open as the Old Salem State Park, according to announcement of State Architect Edgar Martin.

Log huts as they were in Lincoln's day have been rebuilt. Their location and arrangement is exact. Foundations were found undisturbed except by the wear of time and the houses reconstructed over them. Atmosphere of 1831 and 1837 in so far as possible is reembodyed. The store where Lincoln was clerk, the mill on Sagamon River, and all other structures of "New Salem," so rich in memories of the great American, have been completely restored and lack only the finishing touches.

Besides reproducing the actual village, the state has added a large frame house of the better class in Lincoln's day, which will serve as a state museum to house Lincoln relics. This house is modeled after a fine old residence in St. Genevieve, Missouri, which village Mr. Martin said is as a town lifted bodily out of the last century. The architecture is of the best of Lincoln's day.

Contracts for the wiring, heating, and plumbing of the museum have just been let.

In restoring New Salem the department was forced to follow the same tactics used in restoration of more ancient cities. New Salem dwindled rapidly after Lincoln moved away and shortly after 1837 was entirely deserted. When the last general assembly authorized the creation of the Old Salem State Park only the weather-beaten foundations could be found.

The sixty-two acres of the restored village and state park are twenty-three miles northwest of Springfield in Menard County.

The natives of many foreign countries sit down to tables spread with fine American cutlery. During the past year exports of American table cutlery amounted to $2,300,000. In Europe Norway was the best customer of our cutlery industry with purchases totaling $225,000, while such a comparatively small market as Denmark was able to take table cutlery up to the value of $146,000. But the most important markets for United States table cutlery are now found in the two American continents. The biggest purchaser of table cutlery is Brazil with a total requirement of $524,000 during the last year. It was followed by Argentina with a purchase totaling $289,000, while Chile and Cuba each took far in excess of $100,000 and Mexico was just touching the $100,000 line. This growth of the foreign demand for American table cutlery shows best the great progress that has been made in the manufacture of high-class cutlery in the United States. The table cutlery business of the world was in the past practically the domain of European producers.

"Pilgrim" half-dollars, 300,000 of them, have been issued by the United States Mint to commemorate this, the 300th anniversary of the Pilgrims' landing.
